KAUMUDI-MAHOTSAVA

INTRODUCTION

THE STORY

“Kaumudi-mahotsava” is the drama staged in the palace of the King of Magadha to celebrate the time-honoured autumnal Full-Moon Festival of Magadha as well as the accession to the throne of King Kalyāṇavarman to the throne of Magadha. It is composed of the past history of the life of Kalyāṇavarman.

Kalyāṇavarman was the only son of Sundaravarman, who was a popular sovereign of Magadha. Though he had more than one wife, he was not blessed with a son and heir to the throne. He therefore adopted a boy called Chaṇḍasena from a Kshatriya clan of Magadha. His intention was to make him his successor. But after some time, a son was born to Queen Madirāvati, the consort of Sundaravarman. The boy was named Kalyāṇasree. Chaṇḍasena, seeing his future hope of becoming the King of Magadha destroyed, made an alliance with the Lichchavi kings, who were at this time enemies of Magadha and tried to usurp the throne by conquering Sundaravarman. The palace of Magadha was besieged suddenly. Sundaravarman died fighting bravely in self-defence. The queens entered the fire and died with the King. The little Prince Kalyāṇasree was carried away secretly in the darkness of night by the faithful ministers of Sundaravarman. Vinayandharā, the nurse of the Prince, followed them. But in the pitched darkness of the night, they lost each other in the forest. The Prince was picked up by the hermits of the ashram of Jābāli where he was brought up by the rishi with paternal care. Vinayandharā was broken-hearted; she took orders as a mendicant and assuming the name of Yogasiddhi, wandered from place to place. She reached Mathurā, where king Kirtisena reigned. He had an only daughter named Kīrtimati. Rājanvati, consort of Kirtisena, was pleased to place the little Princess under the guardianship of Vinayandharā or Yogasiddhi.

Years rolled on; Prince Kalyānaśree, under the fostering care of the rishi Jābāli, learnt all the arts befitting a king. In course of time he attained his majority. The faithful ministers of Sundaravarman were not idle. Chaṇḍasena proved a tyrant. He imprisoned all the principal citizens of Magadha. Popular opinion went against him. The ministers took advantage of this opportunity; they worked silently in the capital in disguise among the citizens and created a popular opinion to dethrone the king and recall the rightful heir. In those days people had the power of electing their own kings. This is known as the City-Council of Pāṭaliputra. To accomplish this, by the stratagem of Mantragupta, the frontier tribes were set in rebellion. Chaṇḍasena, as he had none to help him, had himself to leave the capital and go there to quell the rebellion. Finding the capital unguarded, the citizens welcomed Kalyāṇavarman into their midst and crowned him as king. Chaṇḍasena was killed in his clash with the Śavaras and his line thus came to an end.

As soon as Kalyāṇavarman attained majority, the trusted friends of Mantragupta were sent to the hermitage to fetch him. On their way they halted in the forest adjoining the temple of Chaṇḍikā near lake Pampā.

In Mathurā, Princess Kīrtimati attained marriageable age and King Kīrtisena was anxious for her marriage. He sent her with her retinue and nurse Yogasiddhi to the temple of Chaṇḍikā so that she could offer her oblations and obtained the blessings of the goddess. Kīrtimati came there walking all the way and after tendering her offerings was returning to her camp. She was tired by the heat of the sun and, searching for a shadowy place, came to the tree under which the Prince was sitting. She was attracted by the strikingly handsome appearance of this unknown youth. The two thus met and they fell in love at the first sight and departed after a short talk. The Princess in her bewilderment dropped her string of pearls.

The love-sick Princess was fading away. She could not express it to her companions, who became quite worried on account of her unknown malady. The Princess avoided her friends. One night when all were asleep, she got up and painted the portrait of the Prince with coloured chalks on a piece of canvas and with folded hands said "O beloved of my heart! Thou art cruel". Nipunika, her confidante, was awake at this time and saw this.

In the morning the picture was snatched away by an eagle who thought it to be a piece of meat and dropped it in another part of the woodland where Yogasiddhi was sitting in a meditative mood. Seeing something falling from the sky she picked it up and on close observation identified it with the picture of Prince Kalyāṇaśree and fainted.

The maids of the Princess rushed for relief and on her regaining her consciousness asked how this picture came. Nipunikā related the story. Yogasiddhi said that the picture was of the Prince of Magadha.

The Jester who was seeing all this from behind identified her as Vinayandharā and came forward and gave the greetings of Prince Kalyāṇaśree. He was in fact sent thither by the Prince to return the string of pearls. Vaikhānasa, the Jester of the Prince, gives it to Nipunikā and receives the portrait of the Prince under which Yogasiddhi writes a couplet wishing for the union of Kirtimati with Kalyāṇaśree.

Kalyāṇaśree was happy to see the portrait and paints the picture of the Princess by the side of his picture. This was returned to Yogasiddhi.

Kirtimati returns to Mathura. Yogasiddhi sees Kirtisena and gives this picture telling the king that it was so ordained by Ekānangā, the family goddess of the house of Mathurā.

Kirtisena was pleased and by this time Kalyāṇaśree was crowned as the King of Magadha. Kirtisena now sends their family priest with his daughter and gifts. With the celebration of the marriage at Magadha, the drama comes to a close.

MANUSCRIPT MATERIAL AND TITLE OF THE DRAMA

The manuscript of this drama originally belonged to British Malabar from where it was taken on loan by G. O. Mss Library of Madras. A copy of it was taken and the original was returned to the owner. All efforts to find a second copy of the work proved fruitless. The original copy is on the palm-leaf of Śrītāla kind and the copying may not be older than 150 years. It is found along with another drama-Abhirāma-Chitrālekham-probably a work of the 13th century. The superscript on the covering leaf mentions only the later work. A copy of Abhirāma-Chitrālekham is found in G. O. Mss Library of Madras but without the present drama. Our drama does not bear any heading. Neither the prologue nor the colophone at the end indicates the name of the drama or its author. The scribe at the close of the play wrote Kaumudī-Mahotsava Samāptah without any apparent connection with the rest of the work. From this it was conjectured that the drama might have been known by that name and was published in 1929 under the joint editorship of Mr. Rāmakrishṇa Kavi and Paṇḍit S. K. Rāmnath Shāstri giving it the present name.

It was perhaps customary in Malabar not to give any name to a work. All the dramas describing Udayana's heroism including Ratnāvalī, Priyadarśikā etc., are found under one heading viz. Vatsarāja charitam. Bhāsa's dramas are found in different names: Karṇābhara is known as Kavacha-tana and Kuṇḍalāharana, Urūbhaṅga as Gadāyudha, Abhishekha as Ramābhishekha, Pratimā as Pratimārāma and Pratimādaśaratha. Hence we can imagine that the present drama was placed along with Abhirāma-chitrālekham without any separate name.

The question naturally arises in one's mind, why this drama is called Kaumudīmahotsava when the title, as it is, is not suggestive of the plot or of the life-history of its hero Kalyāṇavarman. The only favourable factor available from the body of the drama is that it was staged at the time of the annual Full-moon Festival at Pataliputra in the palace of Sugāṅga which synchronises with the accession of Prince Kalyāṇavarman to the throne of Magadha, when his marriage with the Princess of Surasena took place. But as has been observed above, the palm-leaf manuscript of the drama does not give us any indication as to the title of the piece, nor have we a colophone at the end, as is usual in many works of this type, mentioning the name of the work. The singular factor that supports this title of the drama is the last line, which, was probably added by the scribe without any consideration to the text of the drama. The words of the Stage-manager "now again is approaching the Kaumudimahotsava" points only to the annual festival of Autumnal Full-moon that used to take place at Magadha. This was a time-honoured festival held every year at Magadha. We find it mentioned in Mudrārākshasa Act 11 where king Chandra Gupta says "I wish to enjoy a sight of Kuśumapura, now the more delightful on account of the commencement of Kaumudī-Mahotsava."

If the drama is to be called by the name of the festival of Full-moon, then it seems as though the celebration of the festival alone is of supreme importance. The author does not give us any clue as to suppose that the festival, which formed only an occasion to stage the work, was top-most in the writer's mind. Was there anything else that was uppermost in the mind of the author?

A close study of the work reveals that either the life-history of the hero or the mechanism by which Mantragupta succeeded in establishing Kalyāṇavarman on the throne of Magadha, without any bloodshed, forms the centre and was top-most in the mind of the author. In the prologue, the stage-manager, while discussing what drama should be staged, speaks of the present drama written as embodying the past life-history of this king (Asyarājñyaḥ Samatītam Charitamadhikṛtya nibaddhaṃ nātakam). So the life-

History of the king forms the centre of interest, though such a name was not given to it. It was this past history of the king that was staged to celebrate his accession to the throne on the Full-moon Festival day, which was a time-honoured festival of Magadha. So the scribe should have ended by saying 'Iti Kalyāṇa-charitaṃ samāptam' instead of 'Iti Kaumudimahotsavaḥ.' Though Kalyāṇa-charitaṃ or Kalyāṇa-Kīrtimatīyaṃ would have been more consistent with the subject matter of the drama, yet as it has already come to be known in the literary world under its present name, we have to be contented with the present designation given to the drama.

The publication of this work ushered in the criticism of many scholars in the East and the West. The late Dr. K. P. Jayaswal went so far as to modify the pages of his history based on the historical evidence available in this work. His view however, was refuted by Dr. Winternitz, and later a third scholar¹ came forward to show, with all the vehemence of argument, that there is no historical data in Kaumudī-mahotsava.

The entire question hinges on the identification of Chaṇḍasena of this drama with Chandragupta I of the Mauryan dynasty. The late Dr. Jayaswal, based on the assumption that Chandra is the Prakrit form of Chanda tried to identify him with the historical figure Chandragupta, the founder of Gupta dynasty and asserts with confidence that "this Chaṇḍasena was no other than the king who assumed the name of Chandragupta after his grandfather's name Gupta and adds that Chandragupta was his regnal name and chaṇḍa-sena was the original name and that it seemed that Chandra dropped Sena and adopted 'Gupta' to give himself a dynastic title.² In support of this change in the name he refers to the case of Vasanta-sena and Vasantadeva which were the names of the same king and that of Dahrasena, who, on his coins adopts the style of Dahragana.³ In support of this another scholar⁴ refers to the inscriptions of Chaṇḍasātī, the Śātavāhana king,^{4a} coins of Śrī.

Chandrasāti and to Khemendra's Brhatkathāmañjarī.^{4b}

In the first place, among these, the Inscription of Caṇḍasāti does not support Prof. Sharma, because the careful scholar H. Krishna Śāstri gives the Sanskrit form of Caṇḍasāti as caṇḍasvāti and remarks that 'on a second coin figured in G. P. I. in pl. VI of the coins of the Andhra Dynasty by Rapson the reading is Chamda-sāt(a)si with an anusvāra marked to the left of c as in the Koḍavali rock inscription'. As a matter of fact we have coins not only of caḍasāti but also of cadasāti. Caḍasāti is obviously chaṇḍasvāti and cadasvāti is chandrasvāti. It is not therefore, intelligible how chamda can become chaṇḍa in Prakrit as the late Dr. Jayaswal and Prof. Sharma seem to think.

However that may be, the above evidence does not help us in solving the problem, as in the text of Kaumudīmahotsava the name appears in the Sanskrit text as 'Chañḍa' and not as 'Chandra'. The opening verse of Act IV of this drama which refers to the hero both in the Prakrit and Sanskrit texts has chaṇḍabba transliterated into Sanskrit as 'Chandra=iva'. And later on wherever the hero is mentioned, his name appears as 'Chañḍasena' in Sanskrit. So it is difficult to show that 'Chañḍa' of this drama is equivalent to 'Chandra'.

The Gupta Inscriptions describe Samudra Gupta as the son of the Mahārājādhirāja, the glorious Chandra Gupta I and the daughter's son of Lichchavi, begotten on the Mahādevī Kumāradevī from which it was presumed that Chandra Gupta I made an alliance with the Lichchavis through marriage. But our present drama describes Chañḍasena as being adopted by Sundaravarman as a poisonous tree owing to his inability to know his nature and is described as coming from a low caste—viz Kāraskaras. He is also described as being treacherous to his father and of having formed an alliance (Sambandham) with the Lichchavis who were termed as Mlechchas by the dramatist. But it is not known whether the alliance was through marriage or through some other source. It is clear from the words of Vardhamānaka 'Whence is royalty to one of such a caste?' that Kāraskaras were regarded as a very low caste people unfit to be kings and the Dharmasāstras describe them as a low community to whom the Brāhmanas should not go and on return from whom they should perform a ceremony of purification.⁴ If such was the social status of the Kāraskaras, it is difficult to see how Sundaravarman could adopt him according to the laws of Dharmasāstras as his son with a view to install him as his heir apparent. Neither the Gupta Inscriptions nor the pages of Indian History have anything to show that Chandra Gupta I was an adopted son and also came from a low family. The inscriptions describe him as the son of Mahārājā Ghatotkacha. The name of Sundaravarman does not come in this context. If the above line of reasoning has any force, it is not possible to identify Chandra Gupta I, the founder of the Gupta dynasty, with Chanda-sena of the present drama.

AUTHOR

Who was the author of this work? It is here that conjecture has its full play. In the prologue the letters containing the name of the poet are worm-eaten and the space can be filled in by two letters only. The letters following this gap are Kayā-nibaddham which indicate that the author was not a man, and that the name consisted of three letters only. Mr. Rāmakrishṇa Kavi endorses that a close examination of the worm-eaten portion of the leaf revealed that the letter was ja. Hence the name suggested was, Vijjaka, or Vijjika. His mind was, however, shadowed with some doubt because in the following verse occurs:^{5a}

Jayati Prathamām Vijayā Jayanti Devāḥ Svayaṁ
Mahādeva,
Śrīmantau bhagavantam-Ananta-Nārāyaṇau Jayataḥ.
He argues that Vijja is the Prakrit form of Vidya and has no philological relation with Vijayā. The word Anantanārāyaṇau, in the above, the chief deity of Trivandrum may either indicate the name of the poet or it may be that some princess named Vijayā was the devotee of the god Anantanārāyaṇa of Trivandrum. This need not cast at all any reasonable doubt upon the name of the author. Amongst the deities mentioned in this verse the last two are Ananta-Nārāyaṇau, which is in the dual, and not Ananta-Nārāyaṇah, the name of the chief deity of Trivandrum.

This verse again begins with Vijayā, which is very significant. Immediately after Sūtradhāra sings his song in praise of Kṛittivāsa (Māhādeva), we are told when the drama was to be acted, the autumn season had approached—the autumnal season which is a great festival common to all people. Vijayā fits excellently with this great festivity of autumn (Śarat-Samaya). As a matter of fact, in north India, especially in the eastern parts of it, the festivities of Vijayādaśamī are too well-known to require any mention. This shows that the mind of the author was far removed from the site of Anantanārāyaṇa, god of Trivandrum.

We may thus take it that the author of the drama is Vijjakā and she flourished in the eastern part of India, if she was not actually a native of Bengal. The name Vijjakā at once reminds us of the verse which is attributed to her at least in the Sāraṅgadhara-Paddhati^c which runs as follows:—

Nil-otpala-dala-śyāmām—Vijjakām mām=ajānatā
Vṛth=aiva Daṇḍinā proktaṁ sarva-śuklā Sarasvatī.

Evidently in this stanza Vijjakā describes herself as 'dark like the petals of a blue lotus'. Nevertheless she is bold enough to style herself as Sarasvatī and find fault with the poet Daṇḍin because he has described the goddess Sarasvatī 'Sarvaśuklā!'. This gives rise to two inferences: the first is that she was contemporary of Daṇḍin and was possibly known to him through her writings. The second inference is that she must have composed a number of works which attracted the attention and admiration of her contemporaries. Now Daṇḍin begins his Kāvyaadarśa with the following verse:—

Chaturmukha - mukh = āhbhoja - vana - haṁsa-vadhūr=mama.

Mānase ramatām dīrgham sarva-sūklā Sarasvatī

This poem of Daṇḍin must, therefore, have been known to vijjakā. On the other hand, as she chides the poet for describing Sarasvatī as Sarva-sūklā, there can be no doubt that she was his contemporary. How else could she scold Daṇḍin that he knew about her rather dark complexion and yet styled Sarasvatī as 'all-fair'. That she was a Sarasvatī is proved by the number of verses which are ascribed to her in the various anthologies and which are as many as 29. Unfortunately not one of them is traceable in the Kaumudīmahotsava. This need not run counter to the view propounded above. The case is not unlike Bhāsa. Multifarious verses have been attributed to this poet in the anthologies, but hardly any one has been found in his works so far published.

IDENTIFICATION OF VIJJAKĀ

Assuming Vijjakā to be the author of the drama, we have now to find out to what part of the country and to which class she belonged. Both the internal and external evidence found on these points is meagre. We have seen above, how a poetess called Vijjakā assumed the sobriquet Sarasvatī and rebuked Daṇḍin for ignoring her. She has been called a Karṇātī in the following verse of Rājaśekhara, which is also found in Sūkti-muktāvalī, Subhāshita-hārāvalī and Śaraṅgadhara-paddhati. It runs as follows:—

Sarasvatī=va Karṇātī Vijayāṅka jayaty=asāu | yāVaidarbha-girām vāsaḥ Kālīdāsād = anantāram ||

In these lines the learned woman who was like Sarasvatī is said to belong to Karṇāta and is described as the abode of the Vaidarbhī diction since the time of Kālidāsa.

The following lines may be taken as giving a further indication of her identity.

Eko bhūn = nalināt = tatas = cha pulinad = valmīkatas = ca āparas = te sarve kāvayo bhavanti guravas = tebyho namas = kurmahe | Arvāñco yadi gadyapadya-racanais = cetas = camatkurvate teshām mūrdhni dadāmi vāmacaraṇam Karnāta-rāja-priyā.

Here the composer of this poem is replete with self-praise, and she describes herself as the beloved of the king of Karnāta. In one Nerur copper-plate grant we have the name of a queen called Vijaya-bhaṭṭārikā, the wife of Chandrāditya, eldest son of Pulakeśin II, the conqueror of Harshavardhana and brother of Vikramāditya I. It runs thus: 'Paramēśvaratām = a-nivārīta-Vikramādityaḥ || —Tasya jye-ṣṭha-bhrātuh śrī-Candrāditya-prṭhivīvallabha-mahārājasya priyamahishī Vijayabhaṭṭārikā.' In a Kocre grant again—this queen consort of the Mahārājādhirāja Candrāditya is described as Boddi-podhi which has probably to be corrected into Bodhi-podhi and taken to mean 'Alligator of intelligence or wisdom'.

So this learned Queen of Karnāta seems to be in all possibility the Vijjakā of our drama who indulged in that light pleasantry in referring to the description of Sarasvatī by Daṇḍin.

It is therefore no wonder if she has skilfully given herself the first and foremost place in the verse:

Jayati prathamam Vijayā jayanti devāḥ svayam
Mahādevaḥ |
Śrīmantaū bhagavantāv = Ananta-Nārāyaṇau
jayataḥ.⁷

Of course, Vijayā must here primarily mean the goddess Vijayā who ushers in the festivity of the Śarat or Autumnal season. This point we have dwelt upon previously. It cannot, however, be doubted that this verse is impregnated with double entendre.

It is, therefore, natural that she should push her name forward in the list of the gods comprised in the verse. But there is, perhaps, a second trace of her autobiography contained in the third stanza of the drama which reads as follows:—

Kṛshṇaśārām kaṭākshreṇa kṛśīvala-kīśorikā
Karoty = eshā kar-āgreṇa karṇe kalāma-mañ-jarīm.

This verse also has two senses. According to the first, a peasant maid is referred to with glances resembling those of a black antelope decorating her ears with corn sprouts with her fingers. This meaning is clear enough. But perhaps we shall not be wrong if we think that this stanza is susceptible of another sense also. The words karṇe kalāma-mañjarīm are important in this connection, because they refer by implication to some writer who was in the habit of resting his or her pen behind the ear with the finger as many of the modern writers do. If our surmise is not a far-fetched one, probably kṛśīvala-kīśorikā must be interpreted to give a second sense also. This is not impossible if 'Kṛśīvala' is taken as the name of her father. As a matter of fact the name is found in Mahābhārata. Nothing is known of the native place of Vijayabhaṭṭārikā, queen-consort of Chandrāditya. It may be that she belonged to Eastern India and was married to a prince of a Chālukya family somewhere in the Deccan.

May we further conjecture that she composed this drama in North India at Pataliputra before her marriage, when Kalyāṇavarman was reinstated on the throne. Vijayabhaṭṭārikā belongs to about the middle of the seventh century A.D. and to me it appears that the political scene portrayed in the drama pertains to that epoch. The Licchavis were still in existence about that time and even later as the Nepal Inscriptions published by Bhagavānlāl Indraji clearly show.

KALYĀNAVARMAN

The text of the drama reveals that the author Vijjakā or Vijayabhaṭṭārikā of Kaṇṇāṭa had in view mainly a portrayal of the life-history of its hero Kalyāṇavarman. It was staged to celebrate the occasion of 'the acquisition of the kingdom afresh of king Kalyāṇavarman'.

Now the question is who was this Kalyāṇavarman and in what line of kings ruling at Pāṭaliputra can we place him? The text reveals that he was the son of Sundaravarman, Lord of Magadha. His original name was Kalyāṇasree.⁸ Sundaravarman adopted Caṇḍasena as his son, but later Kalyāṇasree was born to his first wife Madirāvati.⁹ When Kalyāṇasree was a boy, Caṇḍasena secretly formed an alliance with the Lichchavis who were enemies of Magadha rulers, and treacherously laid siege to the capital. In the battle that ensued Sundaravarman died fighting bravely in defence of his capital, queen Madirāvati with other queens entered the funeral pyre of her husband leaving Kalyāṇasree in charge of his nurse Vinayandharā who carried him away from the capital to the Vindhya forest followed by some of the faithful ministers of the king, and the throne of Magadha was usurped by Caṇḍasena. The ministers waited until Kalyāṇasree came to age and finding the subjects dissatisfied with Caṇḍasena¹⁰ asked them to rise up against their ruler¹¹ when the latter was away from the capital in quelling the rebellion of frontier tribes where he is said to have been killed. The people of Magadha crowned Kalyāṇasree as Kalyāṇavarman as their king when Kīrtisena, the ruler of the country of Saurasena gave his daughter in marriage whom the prince met and fell in love during his exile. With the accession of Kalyāṇavarman and the death of Caṇḍasena, the dynasty of Caṇḍasena is said to have been uprooted.

If according to the facts of the drama, Kalyāṇavarman was a contemporary of Vijayabhaṭṭārikā, then our hero must have flourished about the middle of the 7th century A.D. But the records of the list of kings reigning at Magadha at this period do not furnish us with the name of either Sundaravarman or Kalyāṇavarman but one inscription shows that a Varman dynasty was ruling at Magadha about this time. The Śirpur (Raipur) inscription of the time of Mahāśivagupta, which records the erection of a temple of Hari by Vāsatā, mother of the king runs thus:—

“In the lunar family, Chandragupta, his son Harshagupta married Vāsatā (Daughter of Sūryavarman of the Varman dynasty of Magadha) their son Mahāśivagupta--Bālārjuna.”¹²

The date of Mahāśivagupta is given as 8th century A.D.

Though the name of Sundaravarman is not given anywhere as a ruler of Magadha, it will not be out of place if he is connected with Sūryavarman. As Vāsatā belongs to the 8th century, Sūryavarman, father of Vāsatā can be placed about the middle of the 7th century, in which case we can suppose Sūryavarman to be the immediate successor of Kalyāṇavarman, whose date synchronises with that of queen Vijayabhāṭṭārikā of Kārṇāṭa.

Again, Caṇḍasena is said to have been uprooted by Kalyāṇavarman. Who was this Caṇḍasena and of what dynasty? The text of the drama describes him as Kāraskara, and the late Dr. K. P. Jayaswal has pointed out that the Kāraskaras were a subdivision of Madras or Jārtikas. So Caṇḍasena was a Jārtika or Jāt. That these Jats were Guptas is shown in the article ‘On the caste of the Guptas as recorded in Nepal chronicles.’¹³ This may be correct or incorrect, but this much is certain that the later Guptas were connected with the Lichchavis. In the List of Inscriptions of Northern India¹⁴ inscription No. 1402 gives the names of Gupta kings ruling at Magadha about this time, among whom the name of Ādityasena is mentioned. His date is given in inscription No. 1393 as Samvat 60 i.e. 666 A.D. His daughter’s daughter is said to have been married to a Lichchavi king. It runs thus:—

“That prince respectfully took illustrious Vāsatā-Devī to be his queen, as if she were fortune, her the daughter of Bhogavarman, who was the crest jewel of the illustrious Varmans of the various Maukhari races and who by his glory put to shame hostile kings, and the grand-daughter of the great Ādityasena, the illustrious lord of Magadha.”

From this it seems as though the name Caṇḍasena which is synonymous with Ādityasena may be identified with this prince of the Gupta Dynasty ruling at Magadha who made an alliance with the Lichchavis.

The next question is, were the Lichchavis in power in India at this time, and if so, where?

The Nepal Inscriptions collected and published in the Indian Antiquary by Pandit Bhagavānlal Indraji and Dr. G. Bühlar, C. I. E. under the title ‘Inscriptions from Nepal’¹⁵ show that they held their sway in Nepal and had matrimonial alliances with the ruling families of Magadha. The following is one of the Inscriptions whose date is given as Saṃvat 143 i.e. 749 A.D.

“The illustrious lord and great king Śivadeva, the banner of the Lichchavi race, being in good health addresses greetings to all the cultivators according to their rank etc.” The Katamaṇḍu Inscription of Jayadeva Parāchakrakāma dated Saṃvat 100 i.e. 703 A.D.) is as follows:—

“In the Solar race there was Lichchavi; in his family was Supushpa, born at Pushpapura etc.”¹⁶ Inscription 15 ascribed to Jayadeva dated Saṃvat 153 (759) runs thus:—

“After eight other kings together with their sons and grandsons had passed, illustrious Lichchavi was born.

“A new race famous in the worldwhich is to be honoured even by the gods that are great in majesty and which bears the pure name Lichchaviexists even now”.

These facts show that in that transitional period which followed the great Gupta kings, when several dynasties were trying to usurp Central Power, two families, the Varmans and the Later Guptas, succeeded in acquiring supremacy. It is quite probable that the Capital was an arena of contest of these two families, in the course of which each tried to oust the other. Sundaravarman seems to have tried to bring about a reconciliation between the two rival families by adopting Caṇḍasena from the Gupta Dynasty, but things changed when Kalyāṇasree was born to Madirāvati, Queen Consort of Sundaravarman. Due to the close relation of the Guptas to the Licchavis (Caṇḍasena) Ādityasena formed an alliance with them and invited their help to conquer Sundaravarman. With the death of Sundaravarman, the Gupta Dynasty came to power. But as Caṇḍasena grew unpopular, the citizens of Magadha rose against him and joining the followers of Sundaravarman, reinstated Kalyāṇavarman on the throne of Magadha and thus revived the Varman Dynasty.

OUTLINE OF THE PLAY

Act I. The Stage-director enters the stage after the usual benediction and offers his prayers to Śiva. In the prologue that follows, he, after describing the autumnal season, relates to us that this play, embodying the life-history of King Kalyāṇavarman, will be staged in the palace of Sugāṅga on the occasion of the celebration of King Kalyāṇavarman's accession to the throne—on the Full-Moon-Festival day.

The next scene takes us to the hermitage of Jābālī, where Prince Kalyāṇavarman was staying during his exile. When he came to age, he took farewell of the hermits and went along with his companions to take possession of his kingdom. In the dialogue that follows, we are told that Prince Kalyāṇavarman was hiding along with Kuñjaraka in an inaccessible place called Vyādha-kishkindhā near the temple of Vindhya-Vāsini, near which lake Pampā was situated while minister Mantra-gupta was working for him at Pāṭāliputra.

The scene next changes to the Vindhyā Hills, where Kalyāṇavarmān, sitting under a Tapanīyāsoka tree tells us in a soliloquay the glory of his father, how he died fighting bravely, how his mother followed him in death and how he, as a child, was carried away from the palace by the hermits. His reverie was disturbed by the sound of anklets, and turning in the direction of the sound sees a group of maidens, one of whom surpassed in beauty all others. It was princess Kīrtimati and her retinue that were coming in that direction. As the princess was tired of the heat of the sun, searching for the cool shade of a tree, their attention was drawn to the refreshing shade of Tapanīyāsoka tree. The princess felt an unknown happiness at the sight of this shade and at the suggestion of the Chamberlain they decide to rest there for a while and Siṅhalaka was sent to make arrangements for her camping. On coming to the spot, they perceive the prince and were struck by his handsome appearance. The Princess falls in love with the Prince, who inquires of the Chamberlain about the name and family of the Princess. The Chamberlain replies that it is Princess Kīrtimati, the only daughter of King Kīrtisena, lord of the Yadus, belonging to the country of Surasena, whose capital was Mathurā. The Lord of the Yadus, sent his daughter on a pilgrimage to the shrine of Vindhyavāsini along with her retinue where she has come on foot as a mark of reverence. While they were conversing, Siṅhalaka comes back and informs that a proper resting place has been prepared for the Princess and that her nurse Yogasiddhi, was waiting for her. So taking leave of the Prince, the party proceeds, in the course of which, the princess lags behind on the pretext that her garment has been caught by weeds, just to have another glance at the prince. The jester who was searching for the Prince enters a withered garden adjoining the temple of Chāṇḍikā and finds his friend. The prince confesses his love for the Princess at which the jester remarks wittily 'First loss of Kingdom next capture by a maiden'.

Looking around he finds the pearl necklace dropped by the princess and presents it to his master saying 'here is food for the hungry'. At this stage, the page comes and informs the prince that it is time for his recreation.

Act II, opens with the description of spring, when two attendants of the Princess were anxiously discussing about the unknown malady of the Princess. It was morning. One of them relates an incident that happened in the previous night. The Princess, as usual, went to sleep after dismissing all her attendants except her confidante Nipunikā. When night advanced, thinking that Nipunikā was asleep, the distressed princess gets up and paints in the dim light of the moon, on a piece of fabric left by, the picture of a youth with the coloured chalks that were strewn about her; meanwhile Nipunikā woke up and found the princess saluting the picture with folded hands with these words 'Beloved! thou art cruel!'. Who can this youth be? This must be the one seen at the temple of Chandikā.

In the morning, while the princess was still asleep, and the confidantes of the Princess were looking at the picture taking it into their hands, an eagle, mistaking it to be a piece of meat, snatched it away and dropped it in front of Yogasiddhi, who, sitting on a piece of rock, was relating how she, dejected of life and travelling at random, came to Mathurā where queen Rājanvatī received her with affection and placed her in charge of Princess Kīrtimatī, and how now she is anxious to see her ward to be worthily settled in life. Seeing a picture dropping from the sky, she picked it up and, on close observation, recognising him to be the little Prince Kalyāṇasree left to her charge by queen Madirāvati of Magadha grown now to manhood, faints with grief. The distressed Nipunikā, who was coming in that direction, seeing this, rushes to her side and by administering, restores her to her senses. She asks her how this picture has come, to which Nipunikā replies that one of this form was seen by the Princess, who painted him and that it has been carried away and dropped here by an eagle. Yogasiddhi replies that if he is still alive, it is none but prince Kalyāṇasree of Magadha.

The jester of the Prince, who wandering about with an anxious mind, was sitting in a grove behind this place, sees and listens to all that was happening, and recognising the lady mendicant to be Vinayandharā, the nurse of Kalyāṇasree, comes out of the grove and introduces himself as Vaikhānasa and presents the greetings of Prince Kalyāṇasree. Yogasiddhi planning the union of both the prince and the princess writes a couplet to that effect at the foot of the picture and hands it over to Vaikhānasa, who gives back the pearl necklace left behind by the princess.

Act. III. opens with the appearance of the Prince as a lover. He has sent the jester with the string of pearls to be returned to any of the attendants of the Princess, with the hope that he may thus get some news about the Princess. The jester returns after his successful trip. He sees the prince in a meditative mood and asks him if the thought of his kingdom was the subject of his meditation. The prince asks him about the necklace, and the jester, by degrees reveals to him how he met Nipunīkā and the result of his interview. He then gives the portrait. He asks him to paint the picture of the princess besides his. The Prince, on seeing the couplet, asks who has written it. The jester reveals that it was written by Yogasiddhi who is no other than his nurse Vinayandharā. The prince then paints the picture of the princess on the canvass as requested. Nandaka comes and announces to the Prince that it is noon and high time for bathing.

Act IV. opens with the songs of Vardhamānaka, who disguised as a minstrel comes to the temple of Śiva singing a song and playing on an instrument. The scene opens in Pāṭaliputra, where Āryarakshita, a follower of Mantragupta was staying in the temple of Śiva as a priest. Vardhamānaka discloses himself and salutes to Āryarakshita and inquires of him if Kuñjaraka has been sent by Mantragupta to rouse in rebellion the frontier tribes and if Chaṇḍasena went out of his capital to quell the mutiny and if the special messenger Hariṇāśva has been sent to fetch the Prince to occupy the unguarded throne of Magadha. This was brought about by the strategem of Mantragupta, who slowly worked among the people of Magadha reminding them of the good deeds of Sundaravarman and thus turned their minds in favour of the Prince. Vardhamānaka again asks why people are so vexed with Chaṇḍasena to which Āryarakshita replies that Sundaravarman adopted Chaṇḍasena as his son, but the latter was treacherous and, though staying in the Magadha dynasty, made an alliance with the Lichchhavis who were the enemies of Magadha and finding an opportunity attacked the capital. Sundaravarman and his followers died fighting bravely in self-defence and the queens died on the funeral pyre. Some of the old ministers took Kalyāṇasree with his nurse Vinayandharā and stole away at night from the city and entered a dense forest filled with wild beasts and elephants. They lost their way in the forest but were picked up by hermits.

At the suggestion of Vardhamanaka Āryarakshita agrees to go to the house of the Charioteer disguised as a begger to meet Mantragupta in the evening; night was advancing and in the pitched darkness Vīrasena another messenger went through the familiar paths of Pāṭaliputra, groping in the dark to the house of the charioteer and knocked at the door. Mantragupta, who was waiting for him, opens the door and inquires how far off is Kalyāṇavarman from the city. Vīrasena replies that the prince will reach by the morning. He further informs him that he is accompanied by a strong army commanded by Kuñjaraka. Mantragupta, who was informed of the love affair of the Prince, inquired how he is facing it. Vīrasena said that the special messenger Hariṇāśva arrived on the very day that the princess left that place and the prince like a warrior, flung aside his thoughts of love and proceeded manfully. Mantragupta relates that he has sent Āryarakshita to Mathurā asking for the hand of the princess as suggested by Yogasiddhi and that the Lord of Mathurā agreed to the proposal. By this time it was near day-break and Prince Kalyāṇavarman enters the city. By the order of Mantragupta, this was announced to the people by beating of the drum. The act closes with the description of sunrise.

Act V. announces Kalyāṇavarman's accession to the throne and the annihilation of Chanḍasena and his family. It is followed by a vivid description of Kusumapura, where courtezans played a prominent part. Lokākshi next relates how Yogasiddhi presented before king Kīrtisena, who was anxious about the marriage of his daughter, the portrait of the prince and the princess. On being asked to explain, she said that one night Ekāṇangā, the family goddess, appeared to her, and giving her this picture and ordaining their union, vanished. Just then Āryarkshita arrived with the proposal of Mantragupta; so king Kīrtisena, was convinced that this is brought about by gods. Mantragupta announces that a great festival is approaching. Yogasiddhi arrives at the capital with Kīrtimati and the family priest. King Kalyāṇavarman welcomes him, and the priest, after conveying the greetings of the king of Mathurā, presents to him his precious gift—the historic string of pearls, which was handed over to him from no less a person than Yudhisthira, and the Vrishnis. At the end of the interview the king enters the bower with the jester to amuse himself. In the vicinity of that grove Princess Kīrtimati was wandering with her companion Nipunikā, who shows her the portrait. As they were searching for a place where they can sit and see the portrait undisturbed, they hear the voice of the jester coming from the adjoining bower. Nipunikā throws the portrait before the prince, who comes out of the grove to find out whence it has come. They meet the Princess and Nipunikā who fall at his feet. Prince Kalyāṇavarman rises Kīrtimati, and as it was going to rain, the jester proposes to retire to the palace. The sky was spread with dark clouds and the loud peel of thunder frightened the princess. She seeks, in fear, the protection of the Prince who gave it readily to her.

DRAMATIC ART AND STYLE

Among the Sanskrit dramas, this is one of the few, perhaps the only one, written by a woman, specially by one belonging to a Royal family, drawing materials for her plot from contemporary history. The characters are neither based on imagination nor represent types, but are living men and women, toiling and moiling in the daily routine of their life. It is a drama of political intrigue centred in the person of Prince Kalyāṇavarman, who was exiled from his kingdom but was brought back by the strategem of his loyal minister Mantragupta and replaced on the throne of Magadha after killing and uprooting the dynasty of Chaṇḍasena who usurped the throne by unfair means. The action, as such, covers a period of at least two decades of a Century—from the death of Sundaravarman, the father of Kalyāṇavarman to the accession of the latter to the throne of Magadha. One thing is remarkable—the object is accomplished without any bloodshed.

This political intrigue is interwoven with the amors of Prince Kalyāṇavarman of Magadha and Princess Kīrtimati. This makes the drama unique in itself. Nowhere in the history of Sanskrit drama can we find one parallel to this one. In Mudrārākṣha we find a similar intrigue portrayed, but the dry structure of political stratagem has not any human interest. In Mṛchhakatikā we have a picture where characters are drawn from life, but we are deprived of the atmosphere of high Royal families. The action is not without the din of battle—it begins with a battle when Sundaravarman dies fighting bravely in the battle-field and ends with another battle when in Act. V. we are told of the death of Chaṇḍasena in a battle with the frontier tribes, though these are not shown on the stage, as rules governing the texture of Sanskrit drama forbid it. We meet here all varieties of people--the hermits, the princes, the officers of a royal court and harem, military officers, statesmen, Buddhist nuns, the usual and familiar picture of the citizens of Magadha, the beggars, priests and the spies. The author has given scope to display an ideal of romantic love by making the hero and heroine free and independent masters of their own destiny. The combination of romance with history makes it as interesting as Shakespeare's Henry IV, where the din of battle and conquest is sweetened by the wed-lock of the Prince of England with the princess of France. The end is happy, as it must be, according to the rules of Indian drama but strewn with tragic and pathetic scenes. The soliloquay of the Prince describing his brave father's death, the lamentation of Vinayandharā for the lost prince are full of deep pathos. At places, the audience must become breathless with suspense--when secret preparations are being made in the darkness of night to remove the usurper Chanḍasena and bring back the rightful heir to the throne. The drawing of characters from every-day life, the love of the youth for the maiden, whose status was disclosed through the device of a picture, which serves here as a mark, the mixture of contemporary political intrigue with the romance of love, has much in common with the new Attic Comedy of Greece.

The prologue serves the purpose of announcing the author's name, title of the play and the desire of the dramatist for sympathetic reception.

The scene begins with a bright and cheerful weather--a blue bright sky, lakes full of lotuses, a sight so common to Autumn in India. After the dull rainy season, Nature seems to be awakened to new life. It is much different from the autumn of the Western World. In Northern India, specially, where our scene begins, days begin to become cooler just before the beginning of Winter, the sun too, loses its heat in spite of its brightness. The action of the drama begins at such a time of the year, when Kalyāṇavarman ascended the throne, and the night was one of full moon.

The next scene takes us back to at least some months, if not years—when Kalyāṇaśree took leave of the Hermitage of Jābālī. Kalyāṇaśree attains majority under the care of sage Jābālī and he had to go to acquire his kingdom for which his faithful ministers were working hard. The influence of Kālidāsa is visible here which may be a manifest effort to rival Act IV of Abhijñānaśākuntalam, though it is inferior to it in grace and charm. The farewell scene of the hermitage, the choked voice of Kulapati—the weeping of flowers, the sad pet deer of the Āshram, the parting scene of princess Kīrtimati from the prince, the entanglement of her upper garment in the shrubs, the chase of a drone—all seem to re-echo Kālidāsa.

The author seems to be one possessed of a masterly intellect, for she breathed life into the dry bones of political history and made it a living thing. The blending of fiction with facts, the device of picture-painting for bringing about the union of the hero and heroine, the political stratagem of Mantragupta, who plays here the role of Chāṇakya—all require a master-mind to build this beautiful edifice. The author was one gifted with such, but she betrays her want of experience, like an architect who has just begun to use his tools.

The plot, however interesting, is badly knit—the authoress tries to give unity to the plot, though it is not very successful. The narration of events in long speeches in lieu of action is a drawback. The soliloquies of the Prince, Vinayandharā and Mantragupta are wholly undramatic.

The drama is not without a touch of supernaturalism where in Act V we are told of the appearance of goddess Ekānaṅgā to Vinayandharā and the handing over the picture. In bringing this device, the poetess defies tradition to bring about decorum.

Kīrtimati and Kalyāṇavarman are splendidly characterised—the one in her sweetness, the other in his manliness and power. The character of Mantragupt—a picture of loyalty and devotion is touching.

The self-sacrifice of the minister and his unsparing devotion to his cause are admirable.

The style is clear and rapid—images, metaphors and similes are used with taste and moderation. The diction is admirably forcible and direct. At places the marital character reflects itself in the clearness and rapidity of style. She realises that she is writing a drama and not composing scis of elegant extracts.

As a drama it belongs to that class of dramas called Nātakas—the plot of which is drawn from history or mythology.

GEOGRAPHY OF THE DRAMA

The work brings to light a shrouded part of Ancient History of India, and it is necessary to identify the scenes of action with corresponding places in modern geography. Some of these are directly connected with the plot of the drama and others are mentioned by way of allusions. The drama is said to have been staged in the palace of Sugāṅga at Pāṭali-putra, the capital of Magadha. The hero is said to have lived in disguise in an inaccessible place called Vyādha-kishkindhā, in the vicinity of Lake Pampā, situated in front of the temple of Chaṇḍikā. Princess Kīrtimatī, the heroine of the play came there on a pilgrimage walking all the way from Mathurā, the capital of Surasena country. These are the places directly connected with the plot. Places mentioned by way of allusions are Sāketa, Kāñchī, Vaidisha, Vaisa, Pampā, (Town) and Kaṭāhanagar, Kausāmbi and Suyāmunā.

Of the places directly connected with the plot, Pāṭliputra comes first as the play was staged there. It was the celebrated capital of Magadha rulers. And our drama was staged on the Full-moon festival day. That the name of the palace was Sugāṅga is mentioned in the body of the book. This was one of the most flourishing cities in Ancient India. At the time of our hero Kalyānavar-man, according to the description given by the author, the city was still in a good condition and was the seat of Royalty of Magadhan rulers. A part of the town was called Kuśumapura-. This is confirmed by the account given in Mudrārākshasa.¹ So Kuśumapura was the central part of Pāṭaliputra. A reference to it is made in the body of our drama.¹

The name of this celebrated capital of Magadha rulers has been obliterated in later times. But what was its exact location in Ancient India? Its location has been fixed by scholars to be the vicinity of modern Patna. Megasthenes gives its exact location. It was at the confluence of the rivers Ganges and Eranoboa (Sone). In modern Geography, the junction of Sone and Ganges is 60 or 70 miles to the north of modern Patna. It was then surrounded by a ditch of 600 cubits wide and 30 cubits deep i.e. as wide as river Hoogly in Calcutta or Thames at London. There were 64 gates and 570 towers. It is not known if the palace of Sugāṅga was on the banks of the Ganges itself, for according to the rules laid down by *Arthaśāstra*¹ the palace of a king should be in the heart of the town, and not on the extremity. Our drama does not give any indication of the existence of a river near about the palace. It is striking why the name of so sacred a river, associated with the name of the palace of the king has been left out altogether.

The only external source from which we can get an account of the condition of this town during this period is the account of the Chinese pilgrim Hüen Tsiang. His description shows that it was only a small hamlet, the greater part of the town being in a ruinous condition. He, however, gives the legend connected with the origin of the town of Pāṭaliputra. But the description given in the body of our drama shows that it was in a flourishing condition, the seat of contest of two rival dynasties. The Chinese pilgrim was interested not in the Hindu capital of Magadha but with centres of Buddhist cultures. And his account does not bear the stamp of an eye-witness. He might have written it from what he heard in course of his extensive travels in India.

The town takes its name from Pātaleswari or Pātala Devī, one of the Pīthas mentioned in the Bṛhat-Nīla-Tantra. It was built during the life-time of Buddha in 480 B.C. by king Ajātaśatru who tried to revive Hinduism at Magadha. It is quite probable that the structure of the palace of Sugāṅga was very refined. The Mauryan Hall, recently excavated, bears testimony to the refined architectural taste displayed by ancient architects at that remote period. It is said to have 3 rows of monolithic polished columns with at least 10 columns in each row adorned with heavy stone sculptures of something over life-size and Dr. Spooner has the credit of proving that it has been constructed on the model of the Hall of Hundred columns or the throne-room of Darius Hystaspus at Persepolis. This might have been the Hall where the Gupta Kings gave their audience and perhaps, it was here that our drama was staged.

The general scene of the drama is in the forests adjoining the Vindhya range, where the hero was hiding in disguise at the inaccessible place called Vyādhakishkindhā. Where was this place? It was quite usual in Ancient India to have two places or sometimes more than two of the same name. This is one such case.²⁰ One of these was to the north of river Narmadā and the other in the Deccan peninsula. The Vindhya range mentioned in this drama has the temple of the celebrated Chandikā. It was the abode of Goddess Vindhya-vāsini a well-known place of pilgrimage in Ancient India. So celebrated was the place that princess Kīrtimatī came from Mathurā walking on foot all the way to pay her homage. So it cannot be very far off from Mathurā. This will enable us to spot out the exact location of the Vindhya range and Vyādhakishkindhā of our play.

The Imperial Gazetteer of India²¹ has the following about Vindhya-vāsini, the celebrated diety of ancient India.

‘A few miles to the west of the city of Mirzapur there was a small town called Bindhāchal. In this hamlet was the shrine of Vindhavāsini or Vindheśvarī, which was then so celebrated that large crowd of pilgrims from central and southern India used to visit this shrine annually. The Goddess was specially adored by the Thugs.'

Devī-Bhāgavata²² too states that the celebrated temple of Vindhya-vāsini was situated on a part of a hill near Mirzapur. The temple of the eight-armed Yogamāyā which is one of the 52 Pīṭhas where the toe of Sati's left foot is said to have fallen, is at a short distance from the temple of Vindhya-vāsini.²³ The Skanda Purāṇa²⁴ asserts that Yogamāyā, after warning Kaṁsa of the birth of his destroyer, came back to the hills, and took her abode at the site of Vinduvāsini. In Kathāsaritasāgara it is mentioned as a celebrated place of pilgrimage. The town of Bindhāchal was included within the circuit of the ancient city of Pampāpura (Firher's M.A.T.). So this place was known as Vindhya Vāsini as well as Vinduvāsini. In the 7th century, the Goddess Vinduvāsini was widely worshipped and her shrine was considered as one of the most sacred places of pilgrimage. Another Bindhāchala²⁵ has been identified by Mr. Pargter with the hills and plateau of South Mysore. This Bindhāchala does not fulfill the other conditions, for its great distance from Mathurā and Magadha could not make either the heroine to come on foot or the hero to lay in ambush waiting for an opportunity to occupy the capital. Moreover there is the absence of the shrine of Chāṇḍikā. So the Vindhya range with which we are concerned lies to the north of Narmadā. We cannot, however, trace any lake bearing the name of Pampā in modern geography, but the Imperial Gazetier mentions the extensive ruins of a city called Pampāpura, the ancient capital of the Bhārs, near this Bindhāchalā. It will not be out of place to assume that a lake bearing the name of the ruined capital existed then which dried up later due to natural causes.

The place where Kalyāṇavarman was hiding was called Vyādha-kishkindhā, in the vicinity of the Temple of Chāṇḍikā. So this must have been the part of Vindhya extending towards Mirzapur. There are two other places called Kishkindhā: one was a small hamlet in Dharwar situated on the southern bank of Tungabhadra near Anāgaṇḍi three miles from Bijayanagar,²⁷ and close to Bellary.²⁸ About 2 miles to the S.W. of this spot is the Pampāsarovara and to N. W. of this is the Añjana Hill where Hanuman was born; 60 miles to the West of this hill is the hermitage of Śavarī.²⁹ It comprises of the hills on the opposite side of the valley that separate it from Humpi which are mild congeries of fantastic naked granite rock with narrow valleys between. The other Kishkindhā lies to the east of Nimbāpuri in South India.³⁰ About a mile to the east of Nimbāpuri, a small hamlet in the suburb of Bijayanagar, there is an oval-shaped heap of calcareous scoria, partially covered by green shrubs. The Brahmins of the spot say that according to tradition it is the heap of the ashes of the bones of giant Bali, slain by Rama on his expedition to Lankā. This is known as Kishkindha. These two, though the former is connected with Pampāsarovara, yet the shrine of Vindhyavāsini is wanting and through the hermitage of Śavarī is nearly, the hermitage with which Prince Kalyāṇavarman was associated was that of Jābālī as told by the stage-director. Hence either of these do not fit in with the other descriptions. So the Kishkindhā where Kalyāṇavarman was hiding was a part of the Vindhya Hills to the north of Narmadā.

We next come to the country of Surasena. Kirtimati was the Princess of Surasena. Some have identified this place with Saurashtra. But in Ancient India Saurashtra and Surasena were different places. The former covered the territory now known as Gujrat, Cutch and Kathiawar and its capital was Valabhī; whereas the latter was in Central India, in the vicinity of present Delhi and its capital was Mathurā. Tradition assigns to it a legendary name, Saurīpura or Sūryapura.³¹ But according to the version of Dhalasāgara, Saurīpura and Mathurā were two different towns. Saurī, who succeeded his father Surā, king of Mathurā, removed his capital to a new place and named it Saurīpura while his younger brother remained at Mathurā. It was one of the towns visited by Hiuen Tsang. From the inscription found by Cunningham in Madura, Vāsudeva seems to have been the first ruler of the Kaṇva dynasty of the Purūravas, who ruled over N.W. India and the Punjab just before and after the Christian Era, or he was the predecessor of Kānishka. Another town of the same name existed in South India. It was the second Capital of the Pāṇdyas and was situated on river Vaigai. Its founder was Kulaśekhara.

We have completed our survey of places directly connected with the plot of the drama. We have now to survey the geographical names occurring by way of reference. Sāketa was one such place. It was the old name for Ayodhyā or Oudh. Its capital was Seyanakot or Sānchanakot, situated on the banks of the river Sai, 34 miles north-west of Unao in Oudh. Mahāvagga (VII-I. i) describes Sāketa as being six leagues from Śrāvastī. McCrindle identifies it with Ayodhyā, the Sāgeda of Ptolemy. Csoma de Kőrös in mentioning the place says "Sāketana or Ayodhyā"³² H. H. Wilson in his Sanskrit Dictionary calls Sāketa "the City of Ayodhyā". Rāmāyaṇa³³ describes Sāketanagara as the Capital of Rājā Dasāratha and his sons. Raghu Vamśam also identifies Sāketa with Ayodhyā.³⁴

Rāmāyaṇa describes it as being situated on the banks of river Sarajā— a city having a circumference of 100 miles. At the present day Rām Ghāt and Gup-tar Ghāt are taken as the eastern and western boundaries of the old city. These limits include all the places of pilgrimage and perhaps these were formerly inside the city.

The Ayin Akbari³⁵ describes it to be of 148 kos in length and 36 kos in breadth which means that it covered the whole province of Oudh.

The present city of Ayodhyā is to the north-east

Corner of the old site and is just two miles in length and three-quarters of a mile in breadth, but not one half of this site is occupied 'by buildings.' There are neither high mounds of ruins covered with broken statues and sculptured pillars, but only a low irregular mass of rubbish heaps. The Muhammadan City of Faizabad is near this site. The two taken together might have been the ancient capital of Rāma.

Fā-Hien mentions Sāketa as Sha-chi and Hiuen-Tsyang as Viśākha. They both describe the celebrated tooth-brush tree of Buddha. Fa-hien speaking of Sha-chi says "on leaving the town by the southern gate, you find to the east of the road the place where Buddha bit a branch of the Nettle tree, where it grew to the height of 7 ft." Hieun Tsyang speaking of Viśākha says "to the south of the capital to the left of the road i.e. to the east, there was an extraordinary tree of 6 or 7 ft. high—one of the holy objects of the spot." Thus both refer to the same tree and locate it in the same spot.³⁶

The Ceylonese annals describe Buddha as spending 9 years in the Jetavana monastery at Śrāvastī and 16 years in the Pubhārāmo monastery at Sāketapura³⁷ Burmese annals³⁸ give the number of years as 19 and 6 which coincides with the account of Hiuen Tsyang. As Hieun Tsyang states that Buddha lived at Viśākha for six years and that this place is at the same distance to the south of Śrāvastī as Sāketa, it follows that Viśākha and Sāketa were one and the same.

In the seventh century the City of Viśākha or Sāketa was only 16 li or 2-2/3 miles in circuit or not more than one half of its present size. Hieun Tsyang assigns to it a circuit of 4000 li or 667 miles which must be very much exaggerated. But as Cunningham asserts 'that the estimated dimensions of some of the districts of this part of the pilgrim's route are so great that it is quite impossible that all of them can be correct'³⁹ we can assign to it a more reasonable limited area as 400 li or 67 miles and restrict the territory of Viśākha to the tract lying round Ayodhyā between Ghāgra ghat and Gomati rivers. It is interesting to note how Sāketa came to be known as Viśākhā. This name was given to it in the Buddhist period and was associated with the name of a celebrated Buddhist lady Vishākhā who lived at Sāketa before her marriage with Purnna Vardhana, son of Mrigara, rich merchant of Śravastī. She is said to have erected a Purvvārāma at Śravastī and the Purvvārāma at Sāketa might have been also built by her. Her father Dhananjan, a rich merchant of Rājagriha, emigrated to Sāketa. Amongst the oldest inscribed coins discovered at Ayodhyā, some bear the name of Dhana Deva and Viśākha-Datta. It may be that owing to the celebrity which the family of Viśākha and Dhananjan held at that time, these coins might have been associated with them and the city of Sāketa came to be associated with the name of this eminent Buddhist lady.

The next town of importance is Kāñchī. This was known as Konjiveram, situated on the banks of river Polar 43 miles to the S. W. of Madras. The place round Kāñchī was known as Tondā-Maṇḍala; the celebrated Tirtha of Śiva-Gaṅgā was in Kāñchī. It was a seat of learning. During the Buddhist Period, there were six universities, viz., at Nalanda, Vikramasīla, Takshaśilā (Taxila), Balabhai (Wala), Dhanakatāka (Amarāvati) and Kāñchīpura (Canjiverum). During the period from 5th to 9th century of the Christian Era, Kāñchī was the seat of the Pallava rulers, when they were overthrown by the Chola kings of Tanjore. It is said to have been founded by Kulottunga Chola on the site of a forest called Kurumbasibhūmi known as Tondā-Maṇḍala.¹⁰

The next allusion is to Vidisha, known as Bhilsā. It was on the river Bitwa, about 26 miles to the N. E. of Bhopal. Agnimitra, the first king of the Sunga dynasty of Magadha was at Bhilsa as the Viceroy of his father. There are five distinct groups of Bhilsa Topes situated on low sandy hills viz. (1) Sanch Topes, 5½ miles S. W. of Bhilsa, (2) Sonari Topes, 6 miles to the S. W. of Sanchi. (3) Satadhara Topes, three miles from Sonari (4) Bhojpur Topes 6 miles to the S. E. of Bhilsa, and Andher, 9 miles to the Vatsa. The whole country to the west of Allahabad on the Southern bank of the Ganges was known in Ancient India as Vatsa. Kausāmbi or Kausami was its capital. It was on the left bank of Jamuna, about 30 miles to the W. of Allahabad. Vatsadeva or Vamsadeva, also called Udayana, was its ruler. Udayana was the son of king Parantapa. He married Vāsavadattā, Princess of Ujjayini. Later he is said to have upheld Buddhism and was converted by Bhikshu Piṇḍola. Buddha was his contemporary and the first image of Buddha was made by him. This image was of sandalwood 5 ft. in height. Vararuchi, called also Kātyayana, the author of Vṛttikās, is said to have been born at Kausāmbi, who became later the minister of Nanda king of Pāṭalīputra.

ITS PLACE IN SANSKRIT DRAMA

Rules governing the dramas have first been canonised by Bharata in his Nāṭyaśāstra. These were further systematised by Dhanañjaya, a protege of king Muñja of Dhārā (974-95) A.D. in his Daśarūpa. The general name for any kind of drama is Rūpaka, which takes its name from the artificial assumption of forms by the actors. They are of ten varieties—Nāṭaka, Prakaraṇa, the Bhāṇa, Vijayoga, Samavakāra, the Dima, the Īhāmriga, the Anka the Vithi and the Prahasaṇa. Of these the Nāṭaka is the most perfect form of drama. Kaumudī-Mahotsava comes under the first category i.e. Nāṭaka.

As such it has a celebrated story for its plot viz. the life-history of king Kalyāṇavarman. It is of five acts and the hero Kalyanavarman is high-spirited but temperate and firm, powerful and virtuous, being the descendant of the famous family of Magadha. The principal flavour in this drama is Heroic and the Erotic is subordinated to the Heroic. Four important persons, Mantra-gupta, Jābāli, Kuñjaraka and Āryarakhita are engaged in the business of Kalyāṇa-śree and the end is a happy one.

There are also five stages of the development of action—the beginning viz. the desire to attain an end is characterised by prince's endeavours to attain the throne of Magadha—which led him to the second stage (Prayatna)—his determined effort to gain his object by his stay in ambush in the dense forest and working through his ministers. The third stage—prāptisaṁbhava—is reached when his success is felt to be possible by the arrangements made by Mantragupta, the faithful minister who worked secretly and roused the feelings of the people of Magadha against the usurper, the fourth stage Niyatapti is ensured by the rebellion of Śavaras and the frontier tribes and the Usurper had to leave his capital to quell them. Then the fifth stage Phalāgama is finally reached when Kalyāṇaśree enters the unguarded capital and is welcomed by the people as their rightful king.

The Bīja or the germ of the plot is Mantragupta's schemes and plans to secure the throne of Magadha without bloodshed.

The subject matter is two-fold: the Principal or Adhikārika action is the attainment of the lost kingdom, which was the chief purpose of Kalyāṇaśree. The Incidental or Prāsaṅgika action is the meeting and Marriage of the prince with princess Kīrtimatī which was not aimed at by the hero but served as a means towards the fruition of his aims.

A drama proper commences with Pūrva Ranga or what the actors perform before the commencement which consists of Nāndī or Benediction uttered invoking generally a deity with a view to ward off any obstacles that might happen to the performance. This is done by the Manager, sometimes on the stage after which the establisher or Sthāpaka introduced the drama stating the nature of the theme whether divine or human, the Vīja and the name of the hero. Difference of opinion exists here, for the earlier writers named Nāndī as Ranga-Dvāra (Door or opening of the theatre) and Bharata does not mention it at all. So Sāhitya-Darpaṇa quotes "Now the Benediction (or Nandī properly so called) such as is described in the present text, being performed before the Ranga-Dwāra by the mere actors is not mentioned by the great sage Bharata".

Hence Kālīdāsa in some dramas and Bhāsa who, followed more the technique of Bharata omitted the Nandī, which is supposed to be done behind the screen and we have 'Enter Manager (Sūtradhāra) at the end of Benediction'. Our drama too is of the same type and the play begins with 'Nāndyante Sūtradhāra (Enter Manager after Benediction.)' We have here again Vishkambhaka, Sthāpanā, and Induction heard to be spoken in the air. Vishkambhaka occurs twice: at the beginning of the play it is pure, where two actors of middle rank speak in Sanskrit, whereas the next one is mixed. Though Vishkambhaka is found in other dramas, Sthapanā and the Induction are rarely to be found. Perhaps the author has adhered to the older rules of Bharata.

The work consists of five acts which are not divided into scenes—here too it is different in technique from the rest of the known dramas. Hence the drama as a whole seems to adhere to the earlier technique laid down by Bharata than its further developments manifested in Kālīdāsa.

ITS DICTION

We have already observed above how Rājaśekhara remarks of Vijayabhaṭṭārikā's style as the abode of Vaidarṭhi diction since the time of Kālīdāsa.

Diction is classified under three heads—Vaidarbhī, Gaudīya and Pāñchālī. Vāmana, in his Kāvya-lankāra-Śūtra Vṛitti defines Vaidarbhī as replete with all the qualities of style viz. flority, lucidity and sweetness.

In pure Vaidarbhī there should be no compound words. Fullness of excellence of subject-matter becomes clearly appreciable.

Judged from the characteristics laid down by poetics, the drama does not fall short of the ideal. The language is lucid, style simple and devoid of difficult compounds. The effect produced on the reader is sweet like the notes of the lute.

TIME-ALLUSIONS OF THE PLAY

The action of the drama covers a period of at least two decades—from the time when Kalyāṇasree was exiled as a child to the attainment of his majority i.e. upto the 21st year of his life.

One datum for determining the time of action is the Full-moon festival of Kārtika which falls in the first week of October—but this synchronises with the last scene.

The second datum is in Act II, which ushers in Spring-time—evidently there was an interval of five months.

The third datum is in the closing scene, where a description of the rainy clouds is given. It was evidently the end of Bhadra or the beginning of September—the end of rainy season.

As marriage cannot be performed in the month of Bhadra, it has to be delayed for a month. Soon after in commemoration of the Coronation and Marriage of the new king—this play was staged on the Full-Moon Festival day.

DURATION OF THE ACTION

Act I. The motif of the play is the Autumnal Full-Moon Festival—Time is Sārat—the month of Kārtika—the scene begins with a bright autumnal sky with lakes full of lotuses haunted by bees where swans are moving about sportively. It was Forenoon but nearing midday for Princess Kirtimati was tired of the sun and was looking for a shady place to rest. The scene ends in the evening for the Jester says to the Prince 'Get up, it is time to go to the exercise-ground'. The duration of the Act is from forenoon to evening.

Act. II. Ushers in early Spring—interval is five months—the atmosphere is bracing—Aśoka trees are in full bloom—Madhumañjarikā says "Now has come near the month of Spring". During these months, the love-sick Princess has withered away and one night she was seen painting the picture of the man of her heart about whose rank she did not know, in the dim light of the moon, which was carried away by an eagle who dropped it in front of Yogasiddhi in the garden.

The scene commences in the early hours of the morning, two of the confedantes of the Princess converse about the malady of Kirtimati and the picture painted by her at night. The Lady Mendicant Yogasiddhi enters another part of the forest and seeing the picture dropped by the eagle, faints—the attendant of the Princess Nipumikā seeing this from behind rushes forth to give her relief—She recovers consciousness and laments for the lost Prince of Magadha and through her sobs narrates the past history of Kalyāṇaśree—Vaikhānasa, the jester, who was near the place recognises her as Vinayandharā and conveys the regards of Prince Kalyāṇaśree—Vaikhānasa returns the string of pearls dropped by the Princess and takes back the picture painted by her. The scene that began in the morning ends near about the noon.

Act III—opens in the Camp of the Prince in the forest—Spring Continues—the interval between Acts II and III is not long—probably a day to enable Vaikhānasa to walk from the Camp of the Princess to this place.

The duration of this Act is a few hours—Vaikhānasa gives the picture—speaks of Yogasiddhi: the Prince laments for his lost nurse. Nandaka, the attendant of the Prince informs the Prince that it is time for His Lordship to get ready for his bath and food and so it was nearing mid-day, as indicated also by the last verse of the act.

Act IV brings us to the vicinity of Pāṭaliputra—vigorous preparations are going on secretly to re-occupy the city—Kalyāṇaśree was slowly moving with his army from the forest of Vyadha-Kishkindhā to Magadha—Now he is near about the outskirts of the capital. We should allow a few months between the last scene and this—the whole of summer and a part of the rainy season—next we see him entering the capital where he was reinstated as king and coronation took place soon after the rains—beginning of Śarat—so the interval covers Summer to Autumn.

The Scene commences in the early hours of the morning: Āryarakshita was worshipping Śiva, when Vardhamānaka comes as a minstral to give his message—the former says ‘I, too, at noon, am going on the pretext of begging to see His Honour’. The Scene continues throughout the day—Mantra-Gupta (315) says—the day has come to an end, this is the evening beauty of Kusumapura! The Scene continues throughout the night—Vīrasena gropes in the dark towards the house of the chriot-maker—it was midnight by the time he reached. He announces that Prince Kalyāṇaśree will reach Kusumapura in the morning (333) At the end of the scene Mantra-Gupta says. “The night has passed away.” So the duration of the scene is 24 hours—one day and whole night.

Act V opens in Pāṭaliputra. An interval of a month can be allowed during which Chaṇḍasena was killed in a battle with the frontier tribes—Kalyāṇaśree enters and occupies it and is welcomed by his subjects—He then ascends the throne of Magadha as Kalyāṇavarman—coronation takes place.

The Scene starts at dawn when Lokākshi describes the condition of prostitute houses—next we see the king welcoming the priest of Surasena—it is forenoon—next scene is in the pleasure-garden—the king with the jester—hence it should be evening—then the description of the rain-bearing clouds—duration of the Act is one day.

SOCIAL PICTURE OF THE TIME

Through the pages of Kaumudīmahotsava we get a glimpse of the society of the time. .

The drama begins with an invocation to Śiva and in the body of the play we see again Āryarakshita worshipping Śiva as a Pāsūpata priest saying "Salutations to thee, O Śambhava, thou who bearest the moon on thy Crest." These two are important as they indicate that Śaivism was in full swing in the country. The State-religion was Hinduism and the worship of Śiva must have been supreme.

The early part of the Christian Era is noted for its great Hindu revival under Bhāra-Śivas, Vakātakas, Nagas who held imperial sway over Aryavarta. The Bhāra-Śivas were Nagas as one of the inscriptions identifies them, "Of the Bhāra-Śivas, Mahārāja Śree Bhava Nāga." The Nāga dynasty merged into the Vakātakas by a marriage and they assumed the title of 'Bhāra-Śiva' as an official title.⁴¹

The national cult and Faith of the country then was Śaivism—Śiva ruled over the actions of the kings and the people; He presided over the country and national service of every type was dedicated to Him. The Shastras which were discarded during the Buddhistic revival, were brought back to their right place. Even the architecture of this period had the stamp of Śaivism—The Chaturmukha Śiva temple at Nachna is a vivid example. This spirit of the Hindu renaissance continued to the time of our drama and the worship of Śiva was still supreme.

The Śiva of the Vakātaka period was that of the God of Destruction. In Kaumudī-mahotsava that aspect has changed; we find Śiva as a Yogi—as a teacher who was trying to dispel the darkness of ignorance. Hence Śiva of Kaumudī-mahotsava has more of the peaceful aspect of Lord Buddha than the Lord of Destruction. Then again the Pāsūpata cult has come into existence.

. Buddhism was declining; women were still admitted into Buddhist order and were held in respect. Vinayandharā becomes a Buddhist nun and takes the name of Yogasiddhi and she was placed in charge of Princess Kirtimati. Kings could marry more than once. Queen Madirāvati was the eldest of Sundaravarmā's harem. Seclusion of women cannot be traced here.

The marriage of Princess Kirtimati recalls the Swayamvara of Sāvitrī. She was sent by her father to the temple of Chaṇḍika to give her offerings so that she can obtain a good husband. She meets there the Prince and her self-choice was confirmed by her nurse Yogasiddhi and conveyed to the king as ordained by goddess Ekāṅga—their family deity. This is a Swayamvara engulfed with certain restrictions.

The king was the head of the State. He was the protector of the State and of religion. The fourth act begins:

"The whole world salutes Kalyāṇavarman who has proclaimed the path for the four castes and the different stages of life."

One of the factors that went against Chaṇḍasena was his failure to adopt himself to the traditional Hindu way of government.

For matters of administration the king had absolute power as the head of the State. He was assisted by his ministers. The army was controlled both by the king and the Commander-in-Chief.

The democratic spirit which prevailed in the time of Vakātakas still continued to this period.

Chaṇḍasena showed a hostile repressive attitude to the people of Magadha. He imprisoned the leading citizens of Magadha. These actions together with his killing of his adoptive father Sundaravarman roused the feeling of the public against him. He was looked upon as a tyrant and a parricide. A cry was raised that he was not a Kshatriya and that he had called in the aid of Lichchavis, the hereditary enemies of Magadha. So the real cause of the opposition from the public was their dislike to the social system of Kāraskaras, who were not subject to the four-fold Varnāśrama-dharma of Hinduism.

The Kāraskaras were a subdivision of Madras who came from Punjab.

The Shastras give them a low place in Society and describe them as one to whom the Brahmins should not go and on return from whom they should perform a purification ceremony.⁴²

But by the time of Kaumadī-mahotsava they must have improved their social status, for if their position had been very low, Sundaravarman could not have thought of making Chaṇḍa-Sena his adopted son.

The Mahābhārata, too, expresses dislike to the Kāraskaras as they were not subject to the Orthodox Hindu social system. They had one caste amongst them with social equality and freedom which did not agree with the settled rules of Gangetic valley.

Mantragupta thus worked on the democratic spirit of the people and when Chaṇḍasena was away from the Capital, they called in the rightful heir and placed him on the throne.

According to the Hindu Constitutional Law, the City Council of the Capital had the power to choose their kings and crown them.

The place where Prince Kalyāṇavarman was hiding was in the Vindhya Hills. This part of the country was under the Bhāra-Śivas and Vakātakas and Vindhya Hill appears on one of the coins of Rudrasena.⁴³ It was a part of the Hindu State.

One of the characteristic features of the time is the revival of Sanskrit learning: After the death of Buddha, Pali was in full swing. But with the revival of Hinduism, Sanskrit again became the Court language. This can be surmised from the fact that this drama was written at the Court of a Magadha ruler, practically at one sitting. Classical Sanskrit must have become the vernacular of the time. Expressions and forms were fixed and everyone in the official circle spoke and wrote in Sanskrit. This is further corroborated by the fact that the Vakātaka inscriptions found near or at the capital near about this period are in Sanskrit.⁴⁴ In the South too, royal documents were written in Sanskrit. Sanskrit drafting must have come into vogue in the time of Pravarasena I as is seen in the set geneological form of Vakātaka documents. Gaṇapati Nāga a ruler of the South converted the vernacular literary tradition into Sanskrit classical poetry. Hence the revival of Sanskrit which began in the early centuries of the Christian Era has come down to the times of our drama and was still in vogue.

That there was a great social revival is evident from the declaration quoted above. The cry of the time was to establish Varṇāśramadharmā. It was a Hindu Puritan Movement which was greatly fostered by the emperors who tried to purge the abuses that crept into society through the Mlechcha rulers. The city of Pātalīputra had a net-work of roads. The Royal roads were frequented by courtezans. From this it seems that courtezans still held a very high place in Society.

“On the royal roads are heard the girdles of the beauties noisy with jingling sound—beauties setting themselves out alone at night for the residence of their beloveds.”

Special quarters were allotted to prostitutes. Veśarakshita was one in charge of these. He is generally an old man.

Gambling was resorted to by low-class people. It is highly censured. Lokāshi is described as a slave of gambling.”

THE PRAKRIT OF KAUMUDĪ-MAHOTSAVA

As required by the rules of poetics, women and inferior characters in a drama have to speak in Prākṛit. According to this dictum, women of this drama also speak in Prākṛit. The only exception to this is Parivrājikā who speaks in Sanskrit and Prākṛit.

Prākṛit is used mainly in the dialogues and only once in poetry where the minstrel, an inferior character of the drama, sings in Prākṛit.

Some of the men also speak in Prākṛit as they are inferior characters—as Vidūshaka and Vardhamānaka.

Prākṛit is of two kinds: Saurasenī and Mahārāshtrī. In conversation and in prose Saurasenī is used and Mahārāshtrī in poetry.

In the present drama the same process is adopted.

Some of the distinguishing features between Saurasenī and Mahārāshtrī are:

- (1) Changing of 'ta' of Sanskrit, when it is between two vowels into 'da' in Saurasenī.
- (2) The terminal 'ti' of third person singular become 'di' or i in Saurasenī and i in Mahārāshtrī as Vijñāpayati=Viññavedi.

But there are a few words of Mahārāshtrī Prākṛit also as in (225) 'driśyate' is rendered into 'disai' and (208) Katham is rendered as Kahaṁ both of which are of Maharashtri Prākṛit.

IMPORTANCE OF THE PLAY FOR THE HISTORY OF SANSKRIT DRAMA

Judging from the indications given in rhetorical literature, it seems that Sthāpaka and the Sūtradhāra had something to do with the arrangement of the play. In most of the known plays Sthāpaka has disappeared which Leví and Pischel attributed to the reformation of Bhāsa.⁴⁸

In the Kaumudī-mahotsava we find though not Sthāpaka, but Sthāpanā. The Benediction or Nandī is done behind the screen and the Stage-Manager enters the stage and invokes the diety which is followed by a number of verses and at the end it is written as Sthāpanā.

Hence it is the Sūtradhāra who comes to the stage and does the work though it is given as Sthāpaka.

It is not unlikely that the author of this drama resorted to the more ancient than the reformed rules of dramatic action. We find this in Karpuramañjari as well.

This is followed by a conversation in the air which is also rarely to be found in the more modern dramas. Hence this work is important for the history of Sanskrit drama in general.

It is interesting to note what the authorities on the dramatic literature have to say on the point. According to Sāhityadarpaṇa a Sthāpaka has qualities and appearance like those of Sūtradhāra and his duty was to fix and establish the action of the play.

(Sthāpakah Sūtradhāra-sadriśaguṇākārah | Sūtradhārapadenātra sthāpako = bhinnatah sūtradhāra-samānākāratvat ||) Bharata's aphorism runs thus: "raṅga pūjām vidhāya ādau sūtradhāre vinirgate sthāpakah pravishet, paśchāt sūtradhāraguṇākritih."

So according to Bharata after the utterance of benediction, first the Sūtradhāra enters followed by Sthāpaka, who is supposed to have the same qualities.

Sāhitya-Darpaṇa again asserts:

'Idānīm pūrvaraṅgasya samyak prayogābhāvad = eka eva sūtradhārah sarvam prayojayati iti vyavahārah sa sthāpako.'

Here the author of Sāhitya-Darpaṇa emphatically declares that 'now-a-days for want of a complete performance of the Pūva-raṅga, the custom is that the Sūtradhāra alone does all and he is Sthāpaka.'

Hence between the time of Bharata and the time of Sāhitya-Darpaṇa a change was gradually taking place—the word Sthāpaka is dropped and he is named as Sūtradhāra.

In Kaumudī-mahotsava we find a mixture of the two. The word Sūtradhāra is given to Sthāpaka—denoting a transitional stage.

Another noteworthy feature is that no actress, as in the case of several dramas, nor another man, as in the case of Karpūramañjarī enters the stage. The sage-disciple is the only actor who was conversing in the air.

These factors give to Kaumudī-mahotsava a distinct place in the development of Sanskrit drama.

KAUMADI-MAHOTSAVA AND KALIDASA

Number of passages of Kaumudī-mahotsava are similar in thought and diction to those of Kālīdāsa. It is probable that the author of Kaumudī-mahotsava, who followed the Vaidarbhī style of dictation, was so much influenced by Kālīdāsa, that the same thought has reflected in some of her poems, perhaps quite unconsciously. Or it may be that both Kālīdāsa and the present author got their ideas from a common source. As Sanskrit literature is vast and most of the works of Kālīdāsa have their origin either in the Purāṇas or the Mahābhārata, the existence of an earlier and common source is not improbable.

Similarity of thought may be found in the following:

Kaumudī-mahotsava I. 23 Abhijñānaśākuntalam

इदं किलाविकृत कान्ति विल्पवं | इदं किलाप्यजमनोहरं वपु

Here I am inclined to think that the similarity is a far-fetched one. The author has not imitated Kālīdāsa as the wording of the stanzas is so different!

Kaumudī-mahotsava

Act I. 1.

Mālavikāgnimitra

Act I. 1.

Both these are invocations to Kṛittivāsa. The salutation to Śiva is a time-honoured custom and the epithets used for the god are almost the same. Hence I am inclined to think that both these come from an older source.

Kaumudī-mahotsava 4.10.

Meghadūta 1.37.

Here, too, some similarity of thought is evident; but the diction and language are so different that I am inclined to trace them to some other common source.

Kaumudī-mahotsava

V. 25

Vikramorvaśī

Act III. P. 79

Here too, the similarity of thought seen may as well be found in many other places—Hence it is difficult to say that it is a copy of Vikramorvaśī.

Kaumudī-mahotsava

II. 7

IV. 12

Mālavikāgnimitra

I. 12

Abhijñānaśākuntalam

Act V.

In the above two places, the similarity of thought is evident; but that is not enough proof to show that one has borrowed from the other. Such ideas are strewn throughout the entire literature and can be used by anyone with advantage. In the case of Kālidāsa, the facts on which he has built his edifice are already given either in the Mahābhārata or the Purāṇas. He has shown his originality in the presentation of the subject matter in a more refined and attractive way. In the case of Kaumudī-mahotsava, the author has to be entirely original, drawing her facts from contemporary history and life for building her edifice. Hence she can claim a higher place than that of Kālidāsa as regards the originality of subject matter and its presentation in a refined and attractive way. The ability required for this is far greater than for presenting a story already current in the earlier books.

MENTION OF VIJAKA IN LITERATURE

A number of poems are attributed to Vijjakā. She is quoted by Manmata in Śabdavyāpāra vichāra and Kāvyaaprakāśa by Dhanika in Daśarūpāvaloka and Mukulabhāṭṭa in Abhidhāvṛṭṭi Mātrikā. Some of her poems one given in Appendix A.

OTHER POETS MENTIONED BY VIJAKA

She mentions Daṇḍin and though she does not mention Bhāsa by name, she was acquainted with his works as she refers to the story of Avimāraka.

In her verse 'Śaunaka bandhumatiṃ' she refers to the story as given by Daṇḍin. Śaunaka was Brahmin hero who fell in love with Bandhumati, the daughter of a King of Ayodhya. Owing to the request of Śaunaka, the latter leaves her paternal home. On the way they miss each other, but reunite after some interval. The Lord of Trigarta, to whom the princess was betrothed hears of the mishap and attacks the kingdom of Bandhumati's father. Śaunaka hears of it and gathering a large army comes to the help of Bandhumati's father and relieves him from danger. Śaunaka was born in his next birth as Śūdraka. Daṇḍin gives this story in Avantīsundarī.

Avimāraka is the hero of a drama bearing the same name ascribed to Bhāsa. He marries princess Kurāṅgi. Vātsyāyana refers to this story.

A reference to Śālankāyana's capture of Udayana may be guessed in the eleventh Verse of Act I. Udayana had a horse named Sundarapātāla and Kātyāyana was his military attendant. His defeat and fall is referred to in Vīṇā-Vāsavadatta.

The antiquity of the drama is further proved by the use of such technical terms as Ātyāhikadūta etc. Sugāṅga and Sūyāmuna were the Royal palaces of Pāṭalīputra and Kauśāmbi. These are mentioned in Mudrārākshasa and Brihatkathā-Śloka-Saṅgraha.

Avantimāsha seems to be a gold coin used in Malwa but the character who uses it here is of Pāṭalīputra. This shows the acquaintance of the author with the other parts of India.

SCENE GROUPS

There are a few considerable passages in the play in which metres of the same kind are used: unity of thought is reflected in the unity of its metrical form:

The passages are:

Act I. 6, 7; Act I. 10, 11; Act II. 8, 9.

Act IV. 9, 10, 11; Act V. 6, 7; Act V. 24, 25, 26.

Act I. 6, 7: Two Śārdūlavikrīḍita stanzas describing the pathos of the parting scene of Prince Kalyāṇavarman from the hermitage of Jābālī.

Act I. 8, 9, 10, 11: Two Śārdūlavikrīḍita stanzas one Sragdharā one Indravajrā describing the past history of the hero in a soliloquy.

Act II. 8, 9: Two Śārdūlavikrīḍita stanzas describe the grief of Yogasiddhi at the sight of the picture of the Prince, whom she thought to have been lost for ever.

Act IV. 9, 10, 11: Three Śragdharā stanzas used in a mixed Interlude to describe the city of Pāṭalīputra.

Act V. 6, 7: Two Śārdūlavikrīḍita stanzas used to describe effectively the life of the courtezans of Pāṭalīputra.

Act V. 24, 25, 26: Three Śārdūlavikrīḍita stanzas describe the mental disorder of Prince Kalyāṇavarman.

It is worth noting that Śragdharā serves the initial stanza of the Prologue of Act I proper, of the beginning of the Prince's soliloquy in the first Act, (I. 8) and at the first sight of the Princess by Kalyāṇavarman (I. 14), first expression of Kalyāṇavarman's mental anguish (III. 3) first description of Pāṭalīputra (IV. 9, 10, 11) by Mantragupta and the concluding stanza is also in this metre. The same metrical form is employed for the more elevated passages of description. It is also used at the climax of some gravely emotional passages as (V. 27 and II. 8 and 9).

Act V
Sārdūlavikrīḍita	—	9
Virahiṇi	—	6
Anushtup	—	5
Vasantatilaka	—	3
Indravajrā	—	3
Śragdharā	—	3
Āryā	—	2
Gīti	—	2

From the above list it is evident that Sārdūlavikrīḍita was the favourite metre of the author. The variety of metres used in the drama shows her skill and knowledge in poetics. She has also used some rare metres as Pushpitagrā, Gīti, Sundarī, Ketumatī, Rathoddhatā. She specially excelled in the highly artificial Sārdūlavikrīḍita. They number 23.

Though rime does not form an essential element of versification in Sanskrit, we find it in some places as in I. 9, II. 16, Alliteration as in I. 13, IV. 13; V. 3 is not infrequent.

PROVERBIAL EXPRESSION

Though the author does not show her fondness to use proverbial expressions, yet we find them in one or two places: as in IV. 5; IV. 12, IV. 8.

The scansion of one line of each metre used in Kaumudi-mahotsava is given below, '—' denotes guru syllable and u indicates a laghu syllable.

KAUMUDI—MAHOTSAVA

(1) Act I

(Prologue)

(2) (Stage-manager enters at the end of the invocation).

(3) Stage-Manager—

With garment of an antelope-skin
Squatted and fastened by Takshakas' folds
Shedding lustre from its jewelled crest
And from his seat of sacred altar
In the guise of the effulgence of teeth
Spreading intelligence that cuts asunder
Knot of Diversity, and expounds the All-soul
May He, the Sīva, so engaged
Dispel the darkness of Ignorance¹

(4) (Walking about) Ah! This is the advent of the Autumnal Season which has become a great festival common to all people:—
For

(5) The Swan with an eager mind
Spies the sandy bank on return
The Chanting Bee on a full-blown lotus
The empty cloud with echoing sound
Attains eminence step by step
And plays the role of a philanthropist²

(1) Lit. translation:

May Śiva clothed in antelope skin be for the destruction of your darkness (ignorance)—Śiva, seated near the altar, the surface of which is covered with the sacred skin of the tiger, and taking an ascetic posture by means of (the figure of) Takshaka shedding lustre from its hood-jewel, and who in the guise of the effulgence of his teeth, is, as it were, spreading knowledge that cuts asunder the knots of Diversity, being thus devoted to the exposition of Brahman.

(2) Lit. translation:

The swan having returned is gazing at the sandy bank with

(6) Also,

(7) The peasant-maid, with glances like that of a black antelope, is putting corn-sprouts on her ears with her fingers.

(Second meaning)

[This Kishorikā, the daughter of Kṛshibala, with eyes like those of a black antelope, (who is writing this) is placing behind her ear her pen with her fingers]

(8) Now is approaching again another advent of Kaumudī-Mahotsava, as the Royal household is absorbed in the expansion caused by the cheerful expression heightened through the acquisition of the Kingdom afresh of His Highness³ King Kalyāṇa-Varman the Lord an attached mind, the bee becoming an auspicious panegyric is on a full-blown lotus. The cloud though now emptied (of water) having filled the three worlds with his sound, attains thereafter liberal celebrity gradually developing (itself) to the highest eminence.

(3) The origin of the word Sugrhitānāman occurring in the above text is interesting. Like 'Swāmī' and 'Bhadramukha' this word, too, belongs to the formulary of the theatre and things relating to it, but its exact meaning is not given anywhere. It is rendered differently by different scholars. The earliest reference to it is in Girnar inscriptions, where the word has been rendered by Bühler as 'the utterance of whose name brings salvation' and Böthlink as 'the simple utterance of whose name brings salvation' and Kielhorn as the taking of whose name is auspicious' (1905) but the St. Petersburg Dictionary has explained it as 'a person whom one recalled in the morning with a kindly intention'. This was based on the wrong interpretation of the text of Trikaṇḍa-Seṣha (II, 7. 27). Prof. Sylvian Levi in his learned article 'on some terms employed in the Inscriptions of the Kshatrapas' has also discussed about the meaning of the term (Ind. Ant. June 1904, P. 163) Apte's dictionary (1890) gives its meaning thus: 'One whose name is auspiciously invoked'. From a close study of the various references of the word, it seems that it is a title which came into vogue with the advent of the Kshatrapa (Saka) kings who ruled in India about the 2nd or 4th century A.D. For the word is not mentioned in the earlier Sanskrit Texts. The actual text of Bharata nor that of Bhaṣa contains the word. Nor was it used by Kālidāsa or Bhavabhūti in their dramas. It is found in the dramas Mrchhing here assuming the part of a disciple of the sage. Then, I, too, will occupy myself with operations which are fit to follow forthwith.

(13) [Exit]

(14) [End of the Prologue]

(15) [Then enters a disciple of the Sage]

(16) Disciple—Ah! Great, indeed, is the reception at the hermitage of the Kulapati.⁴ For when the prince, humble through education permitted by the elders, was setting out with companions of equal age to administer duty befitting his own family—

(17) The trees repeatedly cast down flowers on the surface of the earth like tears. The antelopes of the hermitage looked (at him) with their necks upraised so far as the range of their vision (extended) the ascetics with eyes closed and with tears (in their eyes) were, for a moment, with a vacant mind devoid of (all) thought. I fear that the words of Kulapati, being tainted with grief, were choked in his throat.

(18) I see nothing strange here as all this is with reference to the prince. For

(19) His breast bore the mark of a sacred fig tree, (his) gait is sportive like the movement of Śiva's bull; (his) feet have their palms marked with the mark of goad, (his) arms hung down to the knees; his lovely face has, by the hair of the eyebrows, attained a beauti-

(4) The word 'Kulapati' had to be left as it is in as much as there is no single English word that can convey its exact sense. It designates the head or chief of a family—a sage who feeds and teaches 10,000 pupils.

tying forehead make-up. The prince is a perfect trysting-place of wealth of good qualities.

- (20) (Walking around) Oh! This is Kāsyapāyana! (in the air) What does your honour say? 'Kautsa, whence does your honour come?'—like this?

'I have returned after inquiring of Prince Kalyāṇavarman about his felicitous daily routine under instructions from Kulapati—(Kalyāṇavarman) living in disguise, through expectation of an opportunity (to show) valour, in an inaccessible place called Vyādhakishkindhā in the possession of (his) hereditary friend Kuñjaraka in the vicinity of Pampā lake (and) in front of the temple of Chaṇḍikā'

'What does your honour say?'

'How (is it that) Mantragupta has not yet obtained an opportunity for showing valour—(Mantragupta) deliberating about the means of securing back the kingdom, occupied by the group of enemies far more extensive than here (and) gone to Pāṭali-putra?'—like this?

'Indeed the achievement of an object (in the case of) deliberating men depends upon (sufficient) lapse of time owing to fear of error—'

'What does your honour say?'

'And why the very Kulapati Jābāli was not requested by the Prince for that achievement through the might of his austerities?'—Like this? 'No, the ardour of a Kshatriya aspires to an achievement attained through (his) valour alone—'

'What does your honour say?'

'It is so—May your honour go. I, too, shall gather the sacrificial grass and the flowers'—like this?

‘Let your honour proceed—I, too, shall see the Kulapati.’

(21) [Exit.]

(22) [End of the Interlude]⁵

(23) [Then enters the Prince]

(24) Prince—

The publicity of my predecessors, who have gone to heaven from the battle-field, which cannot count equals even with one single finger (itself), makes the offering of libation water. The fame (of my fore-fathers), whose orders the princes carried out faithfully on their heads, resides as if dormant, like a doll in its own house.

(25) So, until my friend Vaikhānasa returns from Kuñjaraka, I sit below, in the shade of Tapanīyāsoka tree.⁶ (So doing) Ah! this shade underneath the tree is as cool as the sprouts.

(26) This breeze from the Vindhya range
Fragrant with smell of elephant rut
Followed by a swarm of lovely bees
Reminds me of my childhood home
The Palace of Pātali enjoyed and left!'

(5) Vishkambhaka—An Interlude between the Acts of a drama and performed by one or more characters, middling or inferior, who connect the story of the drama and sub-division of the plot by briefly explaining to the audience what has occurred in the intervals of the Acts or what is likely to happen later on.

(6) C/o Tapanīyāsoka in Kālīdāsa:

Bom. Ed. 1889—P. 66. I. I. It is a species of Aśoka tree.

(7) Lit. translation:

In consequence of the breeze of the Vindhya range, surcharged with the fragrance of the rut of (scented) elephants (and) followed by a swarm of bees, I am now reminded of my residence at Pātālīputra which was enjoyed and abandoned in my childhood.

- (27) [Sighing] That same story of childhood am I remembering. Because then,
- (28) Accoutered, armoured and weilding bow
Rushed out my father full of ire
Tears washed the cheeks of mothers
And wiped the decoration of their face
I, all all alone, with moving locks
Was shunted away by the ascetics
Is it a dream? Or an illusion?
False seems to me the story of my childhood.²
- (29) Or enough of this thought and narration of destiny which befits the cowardly people.
Because even misfortune which is adverse to the brightening up of prosperity does not like shadow, leave the side of a man endowed with arduousness. But the high-minded are not cowed down.
- (30) Kātyāyana,⁹ ruddy and beautiful, though he was an abode of magic, was overthrown from his magical power and became dejected and attained the terrefic dungeon of Pradyota, which was impervious on account of darkness. Udayana, the store-house of lustre obtained Kauśambi and Suyāmuna by various uninterrupted (series of) means. Thus the ruler of the Vatsas became triumphant again.
- (31) Oh! Residing just here even for a modicum of time fixed for the despatch of a messenger

(8) Literally: Accoutered, armoured and weilding a bow, my father went into exile in rage, and the mothers had the painting of leaves washed off their cheeks with the fluids of tears. Alone, and with exhuberence of moving locks of hair (on the head) I was carried away by ascetics. The story of my childhood appears as if unsubstantial. Is it a dream or an illusion?

(9) The same word occurs in Bhasha's works as 'Devi Kātyāyani' which has been translated as 'Goddess of Magic'. In Subandhu's book Udyana is described as having possessed magical powers. Perhaps Kātyāyana is another epithet of Udyana.

by Mantragupta, who has gone to Pātati-putra, I am unable to control my impetuosity arrested in (its) onrush.

(Indicating an omen)

Why, indeed, is my right arm throbbing?

- (32) Though my own people are scorched with grief, and enemies have taken possession of my dominion, even now my right arm has not seized the bow.

- (33) (Expressing the hearing of a sound through gesture)

What indeed is this sound, surcharged with the jingling of the swans intoxicated by drinking the lotus-honey. Or it may not be the sound of the jingling swans.

- (34) Mingled with the tinkling of girdle-bells Measured with foot-steps regular;
Methinks this is the lovely sound;
The music of lady's anklets!¹⁰

- (35) Well, I shall turn my eyes in persuance of the sound.—(Having done so) Oh! I see the worldly existence sprouting out as it were. Who, indeed, is this maiden with restricted attendants, seen like a digit of the moon surrounded by groups of stars?

- (36) Ūrvasī, with lovely thighs and hips massive Sprung of the thighs of the Creator
Sītā from the ploughshare, Śrī from the Churned Ocean
The Daughter of Drupada, the altar-born
From the midst of the sacrificial Fire

(10) Literally: Methinks this is the sweet jingling of the anklets of sweet-voiced damsels, timing with the slow order of their foot-steps and mixed with the tinkling sound of the waist—girdles.

But unknown is her birth, and with matchless beauty
Showering nectar in the eyes of men
This maid is verily the Beauty of Complexion.¹¹

(37) (Enters Kīrtimati with a group of Confidantes and a Chamberlain).

(38) Chamberlain—Let your Honour (come) this way.

(39) Kīrtimati—Dear Nipunīkā, why is my heart pleased as it were.

(40) Nipunīkā—My Lady! Thou hast come out after doing Obeisance to the feet of the goddess who is compassionate to her devotees; then why will your heart not be pleased?

(41) Kīrtimati—Well hast thou spoken. Bearable has now become the pangs (of the pain) of separation from my father and mother by the sight the goddess.

(42) Nipunīkā—Ere long will the Divinity manifest her favour also.

(43) Prince—In no way can I explain¹² her origin except from cupid. Because,

(11) Literally: They know Ūrvaśī to be born of the thighs of (Brahma) the cause of the Universe, (Ūrvaśī) whose thighs were beautiful and hips massive; they describe Sītā as being sprung from Sītā (plough-share) and even the goddess of wealth from the Churned Ocean; they say Vedī-Madhyā—daughter of Drupada was born from the midst of sacrificial alter— Madhye-Vedī. But I do not know her birth because she showers nectar on the eyes of people and is the beauty of complexion.

(12) Lit.: See

(53) Chamberlain—Tired is the Princes, having set out walking on foot, because of the breach of decorum, the riding on a vehicle towards the shrines of the Holy, should be shunned. Princes, let us sit for a moment in the shade beneath this Tapaniya Aśoka tree. Simhalaka, who is in charge of the harem will indicate the sight of halt which he himself has fixed upon.

(54) (All move about)

(55) Prince—Now my eye has attained its object.

(56) With feet tender as the sprouts
And thighs that vie an elephant trunk
With expanded hips and slender waist
Arms charming as the Champaka-garlands,
Face lovely as the moon and breasts plump.
Hair dark and curly, this contour of a maiden
Bears the signs of a newly-married bride.¹⁵

(57) (All become bewildered on seeing the prince)

(58) Chamberlain—Great indeed is this brilliance that has assumed a form, because on seeing it has become slackened the sustenance of self-possession of (myself) as if I have obtained the sight of the king as before, though I have been in charge of the Royal harem for a long time. I am eager to know who he is, but I have not the courage to ask him not being introduced.
In every respect indeed;

(15) Lit. translation:

(Her) feet are as tender as the sprouts; and thighs pilfer the beauty of an elephant trunk; the place of the hips is extensive; the waist is slender and breasts plump; the arms charming as the garlands of Champaka flowers; the face resembles the full moon; the hair curly and black; (there is) the contour of a young woman (are) the characteristics of a damsel.

- (17) May these breezes from the outskirts of the forest remove the weariness of the road caused in bearing up of the hips and the breasts—(breezes) fragrant with the rut of the scented elephants of the Vindhya mountains and cooled by the contact with the ripples of the water of Pampa lake.

(Smiling aside) Is the popular adage viz that 'the lotus plant avoids seeing the moon' now true.?

- (66) Kirtimatī—(Sees Nipunīkā with looks crooked with a frown).
- (67) Prince—Venerable one, 'The sight of an extraordinary object is indeed a place of curiosity' so it is said. By the apprehension of (her) form, her high birth in a royal family is determined without being told. But
- (68) What royal dynasty, what renowned name,
Which Royal family has this princess blessed,
By the great festivity of her birth,
As Śree has blessed the oceans wild ?¹³
- (69) Chamberlain—The illustrious one deserves to listen. There is a country named Surasena. Its lord is king Kirtisena, whose celebrity is well-known.
- (70) Some fold their hands (before him) because they have approached the great Serpent of Rage; some again, because (they have approached) a counter-agent to the clutches of politics; others because all region is obstructed by (Vetāla) the goblin viz the dust (raised) by (his) army; the dust of the revered feet of whom, who has attained to the rank of the rulers of men and who is conversant with the feeding basin of Tantra, the princes bear by the head, as if it is preservative ash.
- (71) Prince—We have heard about king Kirtisena the ruler of Surasena. He, indeed, is cen-

(18) Lit. Translation:

What named race of Rulers whose name it is auspicious to pronounce has this princess blessed by the great festivity of her birth as Śree has visibly (blessed) that of the oceans.

the path approved by the goddess alone, the Lord of the Yadus, has, of his own accord sent (his) daughter (saying) 'worship Goddess Vindhyavāsini for some days having repaired to the shrine of Chandika' and has sent her hither with her retinue. Luck to you.

- (79) Prince—I look upon his Honour, the ruler of Mathura, as bent upon an impossible undertaking—
- (80) This body, as tender as the Śirisha (flower) of the garden, which has indeed manifested the spoiling of complexion even by experiencing cold wind and heat, how will it become capable of bearing the hardships of a penance grove?
- (81) Kīrtimati—(Aside)—Oh! Fie upon the fortitude of (my) heart. The eye-sight is again and again becoming fixed upon that (him) alone, though (its) extension is forbidden by the world.
- (82) Attendant—May my lady triumph, Sinhala, with hands folded, announces that the place of residence has been fixed up and this is the auspicious moment approved by the venerable Yogasiddhi.
- (83) Chamberlain—Princess, take leave of the Exalted one. We will go.
- (84) Prince—We part to meet again. This person looked up with tenderness should not be forgotten.
- (85) Kīrtimati—(Exits along with her attendants viewing the prince with glances).
- (86) Prince—(My) beloved has departed with the corners of her eyes lovely with a clear brow and with the affection of the heart oozing out.

She draws away my mind bestowing her heart upon me.

- (87) How is this creeper on the way putting an obstruction in her going ?
- (88) The princess has turned her face back with her upper garment inhealed, being shaken by a branch of a tree and with a bodily frame bent with the weight of (her) breasts which are casket of essence of love.
- (89) Oh ! How has she vanished, warding off, with (her) sportive lotus (viz her hand) the young bee attracted by the fragrance of her face, into the thicket:
- (90) The more and more the deer-eyed one with her massive hips goes away, the more and more she, with her imaged body has immersed into my. (interior) heart.
- (91) (Remains perturbed). (Enters the Jester.)
- (92) Jester—A man has been sent by (Kuñjaraka)
the foremost chief of the Śavaras and Puliṇḍas, inhabiting the frontiers of Magadha country (with the message) “As revered Mantra-gupta says, so will it be” I now approach my friend who has repaired to the withered garden of the shrine of Chaṇḍikā.
- (93) (Approaching) May my friend triumph.
- (94) Prince—(Holding the Jester with the hand)
- (95) Friend Vaikhānasa,
- (95) She of my dreams the goddess of wealth
Attains the limit of the City of Gandharvas

Coming to sight, this daughter of the king,
Has vanished again all at once.²¹

(96) Jester—Who, indeed, is this princess ?

(97) Prince—It is so.

(98) Jester—Alas! There has happened the falling of a blind man into a well. First the loss of the kingdom, thereafter (binding) with a chord viz a woman.

(99) Prince—Vaikhānasa, No, it is not so. This is of her who has gone.

(100) Th Line of hair above the naval, O friend,
Came to my ken when she of lovely eyes,
Dropped her garment for weight of her breasts,
Methinks I spied a wreath of bees.
Placed by the God of love as his bow-string,
For vanquishing the three worlds.²²

(101) Jester—Hi! Hi. There is seen this heap of rice spotless as flowers.

(102) Prince—(Looking) this is that (her) string of pearls showering brilliance which was at first hanging on a creeper but now fallen down. Just bring it.

(103) Jester—(Picks it up and brings it.) Well! not a string of pearls but a heap of rice is seen by the hunger-stricken.

(21) Lit.: The daughter of the king, (who is) the goddess of beauty came into contact in a dream (and who is) a digit of the Gandharva City has come down (to earth), and after manifesting himself, has again disappeared all of a sudden.

(22) Lit.: The line of hair (about the naval) of that deer-eyed one was seen for a moment, O friend, when the garment slipped in consequence of the massiveness of her breasts, as if it was a garland consisting of bees which was turned into a bow-string by God of Love (whose banner is a crocodile) for conquering the worlds.

(104) Prince--(Taking the necklace)

(105) In the haste of the moment while rushing out

This string of pearls left behind

Turn back and see, my friend,

Has she, indeed, left her heart as well? ..

(106) Jester--Friend, Why should a thing spread out for thieves be taken away by us?

(107) Prince--Comrade, no, not so. It will be of some use to us.

Look—

(108) This necklace lovely as a wreath of Mandāra flowers,
Turned crimson with the lustre of the best gems
Brilliant as the stock of the play-lotus of Śree
May it be the cause of benigance to us!²¹

(109) (Enter Attendant)

(110) Attendant—Victory to my Lord. We have taken the requisites. A body of associates are waiting at the exercise ground.

(111) Jester—Get up, Get up. It is time to go to the Exercise ground.

(112) (All walk about)

(23) Behold friend, Has she indeed forgotten her heart which being left (behind) in consequence of hurry at the moment of departure and has been changed into the form of pearls?

(24) Lit.: May this necklace be for the production of auspiciousness, brilliant as the stock of the play-lotus of Śree, red-tinted by the lustre of pre-eminent gems—lustre which is as lovely as the lustre of Mandāra flowers.

(113) This heart of mine, following her
 Freed from its roots is drooping down
 As water of the lake retards
 When its current is deep and strong²⁵

(114) Moreover

(115) My heart, over-powered by the deer-eyed one is heated as if by the intense heat of her pitcher-like breasts pressed down as it were through the burden of her massive hips and was ruddy as if by the brilliance of (her) throbbing lower lip.

(116) [Exeunt omnes.]

(117) (End of the First Act)

Act II.

(118) (Then enters Madhumañjarikā)

(119) Madhu—Now has come near the month of Spring which resembles the establishment of the Camp of (Love) whose arrows are flowers. As flower-bunches are seen on the Áśoka trees hanging down from the surface of the branches, occupied with bees and resembling the arrows of Love (Manmatha).
 Oh, fie, the month of Spring is making (its) appearance adversely to the princess, whose heart is darkened with the smoke (the fire) of the shafts of Love.

(120) (Bhāminikā entering)

(121) Bhāmi—I do not know, being at a distance, of what nature indeed was the happening that came off overnight to (Kīrtimati), whose

(25) Prince—This heart of mine, indeed, following her is parted from its roots just as the water of a tank in virtue of the length of the current.

body was languid due to the hardship of residence in a hermitage.

- (122) Madhu—There is Bhaminikā. She has returned from the shrine of Chaṇḍikā having finished (the work of giving) offerings to Gods in the company of the priests in the late part of the night. She, too, is counted by Nipunīkā among the companions who keep up confidences. So I shall make her, too, acquainted with the happenings (Approaching) Is all well with my friend ?
- (123) Bhāmi—Dear, where is the occasion for the health of us (who are) thinking about the kind of malady of the Princess, the diagnosis of which is not (yet) ascertained. ?
- (124) Madhu—If so, be happy; the diagnosis of her malady has been ascertained.
- (125) Bhāmi—The goddess Vindhya-vāsini luckily is gracious (to her). Let us converse sitting in the dense shade of this mango tree.
- (126) Madhu—Let it be so (Both sit down)
- (127) Bhāmi—Tell me, tell me.
- (128) Madhu—Listen. In the earlier part of the night, the princess as it were, somewhat uneasy, keeping off attendants altogether, and with Nipunīkā as her only companion went to bed.
- (129) Bhāmi—What next ?
- (130) Madhu—Thereafter, as soon as Nipunīkā went to bed close beside her and was asleep, then one prince, who had the form of the God of Love regenerated, was painted somehow on the border of a piece of cloth, charming through moonlight, with paints nearby, by her, being uneasy, sleepless and void of any diversion. Meanwhile, by Nipunīkā, when awakened, was seen the princess holding on her head her folded hands, tender like lotus-buds, and saying 'Oh beloved of my heart, thou art ruthless.' We were informed later by Nipunīkā (about this).

(131) Bhāmi—Luckily it is indeed the dawn! This thing was considered in our mind even at the very beginning. But who is he? or why this thought? He is certainly the one seen by us in the shrine of Chaṇḍikā.

(132) Madhu—Yes. Who else can be the beloved of the heart of Kumudini (lotus plant) except the moon of the full-moon day?

(133) Bhāmi—Well. Let us enter straight into the inner apartments (Exit)

(134) (End of the Interlude)

(135) (Then enters the Jester.)

(136) Jester—(Sighing) Thoroughly disgusted am I attending to the malady (or Mania) of this friend that has arisen at the wrong place and time. I, whose body was, indeed, first nourished with remnants of oblations brought by artisans and painters who brought the alms, that same self, with frowns on others disregarded, being a celibate fed on straw, who does not (now) obtain entrance into the interior of a palace, am roaming hither and thither like a camp-guest, bereft of all, cursing and roaring. If at the time of invitation, I enter the interior with the invited Brahmins, then how should I behave myself? However, I shall take rest for a while in the outer shade of this bower (Does like-wise)

- (142) If the Madhavi (creeper) resorts to the trunk of the Mango tree of the hermitage, whence can the community recluses attain to happiness which they have exchanged for their own interest?
- (143) She, again, is seen in these days slightly indisposed. And it is said by people:
- (144) How can she endure this residence in forest, who has certainly grown up in luxury on the lap of her father where even a perpetually devoted ascetic who wears the bark of trees becomes tired out ?
- (145) Also.
- (146) The arms are emaciated every moment, armlets and bangles are slipping and falling down, the pigment of the lips is in a fading state through the expiration of sighs, the knot of hair is devoid of toileting: the frame of the princess, not even seen by the sun, has become motionless and charming.
- (147) This, again, is my surmise. For:
- (148) Both her cheeks have become pale and spotted through casting of flurried looks: the slopes of her breasts being closely pressed are heated through the bloom of youth, (and) the fever of anxiety is also intense. There is indeterminate thinness in consequence of the increase of the brightness (of her Complexion). Her love-sickness is thus perceptible in her limbs (that look) offensive due to the falling down of ornaments from their parts.
- (149) What, indeed, is this picture that has fallen from the sky, slipped down from the claws of the eagle?

- (150) Having seen the picture falling from the sky, the interior of which is variegated like the mass of peacock feathers, I recall to mind part of Indra's bow (but) in contact with a cloudless sky which never happened before.
- (151) However, I shall show regard to this (picture) that has not yet touched the ground.
- (152) (Taking it and sitting on the surface of the rock, looks at it carefully)
- (153) Nipunīkā—Here is the Creeper-Bower of the revered one (looking through the entrance). The revered lady is seated on the surface of the rock looking over one picture, Oh! This indeed is that picture, which was snatched away by vulture, greedy of a piece of meat, from the female companions of the princess, seated in solitude with much cherishing of expectations.
- (154) Lady Mendicant—Great indeed is this brilliance bound down unto this for,
- (155) The image of this magnanimous one, set up in a picture, coming, as it were in front of me, repels my sight like the reflection of the sun contained in a mirror.
- (156) (Looking at it again)
Alas! Oh Great Queen (Falls into a swoon).
- (157) Nipunīkā—Oh fie! The revered one, while viewing the picture, has fainted (saying) 'Alas! Oh great queen'. Great calamity is imminent (Approaching all at once and taking her in her lap) Compose yourself, Compose yourself.
- (158) Lady Mendicant—(Being a little composed) 'Alas! Oh Great queen'!.....

With his moving side-locks of boyhood, Kalyāṇaśrī, who has been deposited into my hands as a trust by thee who hast set out to thy husband's world. He, who,..... through fear of enemies, with officers-in-charge, sons of ministers..... (Swoons)

- (159) Jester—What indeed is this! like a sound from the interior of that creeper-bower? However, let me behold through the branches. (So doing)—One lady-mendicant viewing the picture of my companion has fallen into a swoon. Another woman again is composing her taking her on her lap. I surmise that this is Vinayandharā who became a female ascetic through indifference to worldly life.
- (160) Nipunīkā—Be composed, be composed.
- (161) Lady Mendicant—(Having composed herself) He would have grown up so big²⁷ by this time (if) his body had not been cut to pieces.
- (162) Nipunīkā—(To herself) May the person dear to the heart of the princess, be indeed a relative of the revered one. (Aloud) Oh revered one, what is this worry which would befit a householder? What is this unpolished speech inconsistent with wisdom and discrimination?
- (163) Lady mendicant—(Having reflected) Oh, Nipunīkā, O Nipunīkā,!
- (164) Nipunīkā—(To herself) I shall communicate all to her who has recovered from her swoon (Aloud) Where is that prince Kalyāṇaśrī?
- (165) Lady mendicant—

(27) Literally 'great'.

greedy of a piece of meat, from the hands of the (female) companions which again reached, by chance, the hands of the revered one from the sky.

(172) Lady mendicant—Is that so? Tell me how a prince of such complexion was seen by her.

(173) Nipunīkā—In this manner.

(174) Lady Mendicant—This prince painted by her, may indeed, be a scion of Magadha Dynasty. There is no other one resembling this form.

(175) Nipunīkā—This is evil news indeed. And is the prince of the revered one another?

(176) Lady mendicant—I shall narrate to thee the real facts. Formerly there was a ruler of Magadha called Sundaravarman. His chief queen was Madirāvatī by name. I, her foster-sister and companion, became the nurse of the Prince and turning a recluse through disgust to the world, when the Royal Family disappeared there through misfortune, entering Mathurā, am living. Now, again, Kīrtimatī is my all in all.

(177) Jester—Hi! Hi! (this) I, have become a religious beggar. Mantragupta says that Vaikhānasa is an idiot.

(178) Lady mendicant—(To herself) Now have I obtained an opportunity, so I ask her. That which concerns Kīrtimatī, Nipunīkā is aware of all that. (Music from behind)

(180) The Princess neither spies the moon
Nor listens to music sweet
Nor lies on a fleecy bed
Cool and soft with tender leaves.³⁰

(30) Lit: The princess is not able to look at the moon, nor to listen to anything sweetly sung, nor to lie down on a bed composed of fragments of tender leaves.

- (181) Lady mendicant—Oh! The (minstrel) song of these two minstrels is indeed well-sung. Nipuṇikā, I ask you something concerning Kirtimati.
- (182) Nipu—Let the revered one order me.
- (183) Jester—I suppose that she is the confidante companion of the Princess.
- (184) Lady mendicant—
 Whence the face of the daughter of the king
 Is shrouded with displeasure?
 Tears trickle from her eyes
 Like hoar-frost from the lotuses
 And soil the colour of her cheeks.³¹
- (185) Nipuṇikā—The Prince who has entered the mind of the Princess is the subject-matter of the question (asked) by the revered one. She, now, moves about hither and thither like a tender plantain-tree, with heart shattered through (deep) sighs and forsakes even the female companions of her desire. If the revered one will not see any good about her, then certainly the poor girl will ascend the summit of the mountain of sorrow.
- (186) Lady mendicant—
 The Princess passes sleepless nights
 Bereft of Love, eyes red with wakening
 She awaits the dawn restlessly
 As Chakravāka looks for the morn.³²

(31) Lit.: Whence does the face of the daughter of the king bar, as it were, sudden negation of pleasure? (Face) the cheeks of which are soiled by the trickling of water from the eyes like a lotus with watr-drops of the hoar-frost.

(32) That princess passes the night without (her) beloved, with eyes red with sleepness. Mythinks, she awaits the time of the daybreak as the Chakravāka (bird).

- (196) Nipunīkā My heart is consoled as it were What, indeed, may all this be?
- (197) Lady mendicant—Child, since it is not known to us. Is it an unexpected improvement in the knowledge of things?
- (198) Jester—It is thus.
- (199) Lady mendicant—So it be. The upholding of my life seems to have some purpose.
- (200) Jester—Revered one, the image of my friend has been painted by the princess; you, too, should paint my image.
- (201) Lady mendicant—(Smiling) Your words shall be attended to.
- (202) Nipunīkā—Oh! Fie upon thee, O wicked one.
- (203) Jester—Revered one, don't be angry.
This (Self) shall please you.
(Takes out the necklace from the upper garment and gives it.)
- (204) Nipunīkā—Ha! This is that necklace, which was lost by the princess (Holds the necklace in her joined palms)
- (205) Lady Mendicant—(Aside) Both Kīrtimatī and Kalyāṇavarman have grown up on my lap and are afflicted with love towards each other. Therefore, I shall unite them as intimately as a Word and its Sense. (Reads after writing on the border of the scroll with a metallic ore)
- (206) As Saṇḍaka did Bandhumatī
And Kurangī prince Avimāraka
Kīrtimati deserves Kalyāṇavarman
To obtain as her Lord.³⁴

(34) Lit.: This Kīrtimati deserves Kalyāṇavarman as her husband, as Bandhumatī and Saṇḍaka and Kurangī Prince Avimāraka.

- (207) In the evening give this, that has been preserved secretly, to the Prince. Show thyself again. (Hands over the portrait)
- (208) Jester—As the revered one orders.
(Exit taking the picture)
- (209) Nipunikā—Revered one! How to save the life of the Princess?
- (210) Lady Mendicant—May depression be no thine.
- (211) Look—Being hidden, in consequence of the secret application (of means), I remove the princess's fever of anxiety by giving her beloved, like a shower without clouds falling from the sky removes the desiccation of the earth through draught (Shower) divoid of the thunder of rain.
- (212) (Exeunt omnes)
- (213) (End of the Second Act)

(214) ACT III

- (215) (Enters the Prince in an amorous state)
- (216) Prince—Inconceivable, even to the mind to possess the person whose affection at heart is unknown. What fruit, indeed, does this Love bear who is suddenly jealous of me in this manner.
- (217) (Gesticulating affliction of love) Hard indeed! The Sun of Love generates heat to the Company of travellers—viz. the love-sick persons, roaming in the desert of worldly objects which are impassable through mirages of false expectations manifested at midday of youth. Whence?

- (218) As He of the crocodile-banner, (the God of Love) has been made mouthpiece to the blaze (of the fire) of Śiva's wrath, he is seen, (now) on that account, in a blazing form.
- (219) Fie, Oh! Cupid makes himself more powerful by depending upon others.
- (220) The fragrance of the Mango and Aśoka blossoms
Fill the evening breezes; the moving cranes
Colour the dark evening of a rainy day,
The Bright Moon shines on an autumn sky,
If these serve not as shafts, how can I
Distressed in Spirit, help the formless God?⁽³⁵⁾
- (221) Is it likely that she might be seen again?
Miserable indeed! The whole of worldly life is helpless for lack of its own activity.
For,
- (222) The accursed heart of mine belies my eyes in the pleasure of remembrance though benifitted by participating in the nectar of her beauty.
- (223) Where, indeed, is her string of pearls, which has become the very essence of my life. Ah! if I can see sometime or other a confidante or an attendant of that princess—so friend Vaikhānasa has come out with this intention: the string of pearls is in his hands. Now, by what support shall I sustain my drooping self? Let it go, I divert my distracted self by going to that same withered garden which is the receptacle of the moment of sight of the beloved one.

(35) Lit.: The breezes are scented with the fragrance of the full-blown Asoka and mango blossom, the darkness produced by the rainy season has its surface variegated in colour by hundreds of cranes moving to and fro, and the evening of the Autumn days is bright with the new moon body—If these are not the weapons he himself being devoid of body—What can I, who am so distressed, do?

(224) (Then enters the jester)

(225) Jester—(Walking round and looking)

Here is seen my friend with a handsome yet mournful form like a Vidyadhara boy fallen to earth with the knowledge of the announcement of his freedom from curse. (Approaching) may my friend be victorious. Oh dear! no reply to my words!. He is seen only like a bull painted on a picture with his eyes closed through anxiety and opened again. So, I speak to him. Prince, are you thinking of the prosperity of your kingdom?

(226) Prince—(Opening his eyes and looking) Oh! Friend Vaikhānasa? Friend, so it is; but—

(227) As Śree, emanated from the master of rivers
The all-pervading and divine Prachetasah
With lustrous and fighting serpents
Whose heads are decked with shining gems,
She who will espouse Purushottama alone,
Like her, the Princess, as if rising from the best of men,
Along with the lustrous, the Brave and the Opulent,
Seeking none but the best of men as her Lord,
—She alone is sought for in my heart!³⁶

(36) Lit.: That Princess is always sought for in my heart, who has emanated from the supreme king prachetasah, the master of the Oceans, along with lustrous fighting and opulent (princes) with heads shining with gems, and is evidently a suitor of Purushottama (the best of men) and shall not choose any other Lord, like Royal Sovereignty who has emanated from the all-pervading and divine Prachetasah (Ocean), master of rivers, along with lustrous and fighting serpents with heads shining with gems and who is evidently a suitor of Purushottama (Vishnu) and shall select no other master.

- (228) Friend, owing to the cessation of winter, the days having turned towards spring, let us rest for a while on the surface of this rock filled with the fragrance of the mountain.
- (229) Jester—As my master orders.
- (230) (Both sit down)
- (231) Prince—Just bring the string of pearls, proud of being in contact with the breasts of my beloved.
- (232) Jester—How has the string disappeared?
- (233) Prince—Fie, Fool.
- (234) Jester—Hi! Hi! Let Vaikhānasa be a fool, that is Vaikhānasa is illiterate. Now listen to my words, blame me after that. I was seen from here by Nipuṇikā, inseperable from the heart of the Princess, searching for the string of pearls belonging to her .
- (235) Prince—(With curiosity) What! Were you seen by Nipuṇikā? Then, then?
- (236) Jester—What ‘then, then?’ What wouldst thou do to a thief caught red-handed?
- (237) Prince—Give up jokes. State clearly.
- (238) Jester—Yes, Yes (showing the portrait) Look, look at your portrait the picture (painted) by Her Honour.
- (239) Prince—Is this indeed true? What man, indeed, will believe in the pre-eminence of good luck of this kind? In like manner my heart exhilerates violently.
- (240) See—
Now am I bearing (this) body which is a receptacle of the extreme adoration of my beloved and which is covered with horripilation of hair bursting forth, like a female Royal elephant with her body, illuminated by the Nirajana Ceremony, and temples lovely on account of decorations of Red lead powder.

(241) Also—

(242) This vernal breeze that was Southern (favourable) before has, on the contrary, become averse. The arrows of (Love) whose bow consists of flowers, were, at the outset thunderbolts and thereafter (become) happy showers (in tears); even the rays of the moon, oozing out, at night, which are devoid of the particles of heat and tricle out nectar, are, doubtless, compelling us to offer libations to the manes.

(243) (Examines the picture carefully)

(244) Jester—Is it the knowledge of art of Her Honour or the beauty of your form that is being examined by you?

(245) Prince—Indeed this Portrait-work of (my) beloved certainly evinces special skill pertaining to Art as well as her love for me. Whence

(246) In the development of my likeness incongruities disappear between her steady love and composure disturbed by bashfulness being face to face (with me)

(247) Jester—Oh friend! I have a great doubt as to who has superior artistic sense between you both, yourself and Her Honour. So produce the likeness of Her Honour at the end of the scroll with these mineral paints imbedded in the huge rocks of the Vindhya.

- (248) Prince—Friend, this, too, is my intention, but:—
- (249) It may cause contentment if my beloved, possessed of emotions (delicate) like best flowers, is painted, with this haunting thought that she is thin with love, I am, alas! Unable to wither up my beloved.
- (250) Jester—Unfolds the painting-scroll.
- (251) Prince—(Seeing and reading “Saunaka etc.”) Whose writing is this?
- (252) Jester—Of the revered Yogasiddhi.
- (253) Prince—Oh! the revered one is disinterestedly affectionate to me.
- (254) Jester—(to himself) now shall I inform who Yogasiddhi is in reality—(Aloud) Indeed She is not disinterestedly affectionate.
- (255) Prince—How?
- (256) Jester—In this way.
- (257) Prince—(With curiosity) How?
- (258) Methinks my nurse, (turned a recluse) through worldly indifference, has come back again from the other World. Now shall I see her with these two eyes of mine?
- (259) (Sheds tears)
- (260) Jester—Be consoled, be thou be consoled! The time of that other world is now over.
- (261) Prince—So, indeed, (my) vital spirits are being preserved somehow.
- (262) Jester—(Again spreading out the picture) Let Your Honour paint.

- (263) Prince—(portrays the image of Kirtimati)
- (264) (Nandaka enters)
- (265) Nanda—Victory to my Lord, the time for bath has approached.
- (266) Jester—Fie! the mid-day has, as it were, drawn to a close with the cumulation of hunger issuing out of my body. (Rising) Let Your Honour get up.
- (267) Prince—(Giving the picture to the hands of the Jester and taking a round) Oh! The sun is bursting like a King fond of the Chastising Rod. For,
- (268) The female elephant is touched by the male elephant with sprays of water oozing out through the trunk. The Lord of the Serpents is attempting another coiling round the trunk of the Sandal tree. The young one of the deer, stirred up and impelled by circumstances to the coach-like lap through its intimacy with the ascetic, delighted in the posture of contemplation, is settling down sleepily.
- (269) (Exeunt omnes.)
- (270) End of Third Act.

(271) ACT IV

- (272) Enters Vardhamānaka in the garb of a minstrel (Kaumbhahonavika)
- (273) Vardha—Sings playing on Kumbha Kūṇavam (musical instrument)
- (274) Of no avail is the strength of the arrows of Rāma, even the story of Guha (Kārtikeya) is burried in the hill of Krouncha. Oh Vināyaka (Gaṇeśha) I regard your tusk as the hollow of a hill covered with shrubs and leaves.

(275) (Again sings.)

(276) Balabhadra shines as does the moon
One with the dark spot other with his
His glow rises as does the moon's garment
By drink and taste of Revati's lips.³⁷

(277) (Taking a round) I have thus been ordered by the revered Mantragūpta—"Amiable one! go to the shrine of Śūlapāṇi and there tell Āryarakshita, who has put on the garb of Pāśupata 'come' (lit. come close to me) (Taking a round and looking) This is the shrine of Śūlapāṇi endowed with supernatural powers. Here, indeed, are seen some of the soldiers attached to our camp, who have offered themselves with their riches and have been found pure by test, who have assumed another garb and are practicing religious rites.

(278) (From behind the curtain) my obeisance to Thee, Śambhu, (thou) who (bear) the moon on (thy) crest.

(279) Vardha—(Placing his ear in an attentive manner) Indeed, this is the voice (heard) of the Venerable one, engaged in salutation to the feet of the divine Śiva Bhaṭṭāraka. However, I shall wait in the dark shade of this tree (Vilva) marked as a trysting place.

(37) Lit.: Balabhadra shines like the moon spotted with his dark garment bearing the rising glow caused by drink and sweetness (lit honey) from the mouth of Revati (In the case of the moon the redness of rie due to the approach of the constellation Revati in the Vernal Season).

- (280) (Āryarakshita then enters bearing the garb of Pāśupata).
- (281) Ārya—Salutations to thee, Oh; Sambhava, thou who bearest the moon on thy crest.
- (282) Oh thou of dreadful garb, thou dost bear poison in the throat, the skull in the hand, an elephant-hide on the shoulder, serpent on the breast. Thou dost bear on (thy) forehead the digit of the moon, which is the inner essence of the sea, and is as beautiful as the forehead of a damsel of Lāṭa Country.
- (283) This indeed has been my incessant prayer since my birth.
- (284) May the genuine devotion of us, sucking the breasts of mothers even in the other birth manifest itself towards their feet—(us) whose tiny understanding has become turbid through attachment to desires and whose eyes have become naturally blind to thy divine manifestation.
- (285) (Saluting, circumambulating and walking round).
- (286) For a moment I shall here enjoy the shade of the Vilva tree to the north of the rampart where the active agents of Mantra-gupta are awaiting me (Does it accordingly).
- (287) Vardha—(Approaching) Revered one, I salute thee.
- (288) Ārya—Ah! Vardhamanaka! O Vardhamanaka, when the wardens of the march following Kuñjaraka were enraged (and) the wretched Chaṇḍasena has sallied out of the town with his army, do you know if the emergent messenger Hariṇāśva has now been sent by Mantragupta to bring back our master?

(289) Vardha—I know that he has been sent, but not his intention.

(290) Ārya—Ah! Well-done Mantra-gupta, Well-done! when this slave by birth, who has been found pure by test, though a close attendant, does not understand your intention in the change (of mind), whence, indeed, is there scope for a flaw in your counsel, or the injunctions both of Religion and desires are the same; for,

(291) Subordinates without considering the investigation of the motive of their masters execute the orders. Whether there is any fruition or not, the Āryas carry out the import of the scriptures as their own duty.

(292) Vardha—Revered Sir, if the Lord comes now, then the kingdom is regained without agitation.

(293) Ārya—What doubt? Behold—the people of the city and the Provinces were reminded secretly of the well-known good acts of King Sundaravarman by Mantragupta, the aged ministers such as Sagara Dutta etc., who have been employed before, having gathered. If the Lord comes now they will perpetuate the slaughter of the enemy with one clod of earth; what, indeed, if they touch the feet of the Lord.

(294) Vardha—By what reason have the people become detached from the wretched Chāṇḍa-Sena?

(295) Ārya—By that very fault of (his) nature. Behold,

- (296) His subjects grew palid in the jail,
 Their cheeks were fringed with lines,
 Grief overwhelmed their noble hearts,
 The quarters came under his wicked rule
 He proved a Karaskara among kings.³⁸
- (297) Vardha—What then? Whence is Royalty to one of such caste?
- (298) Ārya—It is a long story, but I narrate in brief. Long ago this wretched Chanḍasena was adopted by Sundaravarman as his son like a poison tree owing to its nature unknown to him.
- (299) Vardha—What then?
- (300) Ārya—Then although professing to be of the Magadha family, making an alliance with Lichchavis who were (Mlechhas) barbarians, and were the enemies of Magadha dynasty, beseiged Kuśumapura, finding an opportunity.
- (301) Vardha—Then, then?
- (302) Ārya—Then, when the battle had commenced, the King threw him into the midst of Lichchavi Clan, having pushed him aside with his hand, though worthy of slaughter, as having adopted (him) as a son.
- (303) He, the king of Magadha, who performed the festivity of battle with his own might as the enemies went to heaven from here as if through fear. Thereafter with a radiant form intensified by jealousy, he himself went there to heaven.

(38) Lit.: He made his subjects figured with lines on cheeks palid with incarceration in the jail and overwhelmed with grief in consequence of imprisonment. He brought the quarters under his control with wicked rule. He is, indeed, a Kāraskara among kings just at present.

- (304) Vardha—Ha! Fie! In an unequal battle has arisen the death of even a King as this.
- (305) Ārya—So it is; even the God Vishnu was sent to the other world by a certain fowler named Jara.
- (306) Vardha—Occasion having arisen, I now ask, whence is your residence in a penance grove in association with your master?
- (307) Ārya—This may now be listened to—When our fathers ascended Heaven with our masters, mothers, too, consigned themselves to the God of Fire along with the Chief Queen. We, too, along with our master, espousing another social order, having been brought to the Atavī forest surreptitiously, indeed, at night by a nurse named Vinayandharā, who was of the same age (with us), were forthwith made to disperse (by her) being frightened by the roaring of the wild elephants. We were, again, carried to the hermitage by mendicants who came accidentally—thus ends the account.
- (308) Vardha—So it is; Venerable Mantragupta is desirous of seeing your Honour.
- (309) Ārya—May Your Honour go; I, too, at noon, going on the pretext of a begging round, shall see His Honour going to the residence of the Chariot-maker.
- (310) (Both exeunt)
- (311) (Mixed Interlude)
- (312) (Then enters Mantragupta wearing a turban and holding a sword).
- (313) Mantragupta—Excellent . oh! my time, indeed, with mind occupied with the business of Master, has been passing away with night and day unperceived.

Now again

- (314) Statesmanship, owing to the terror caused by the perplexity of qualities, has adequately attained its valour. The beauty of words directed to the stage is very much agitated (confounded) like that of an actor.
- (315) (Looking) The day has come to an end. Oh! indeed! this is the evening beauty of Kuśumapura thronged with thousands of men and women in perpetual glee.
Here, indeed,
- (316) Pet was relinquished by the young woman though angry through love. What is the good of confidante. Elderly woman accoutred like a Sainrandhra Woman is seated at her sweet will with a face beaming with smile. The fair-browed and brown-complexioned (damsels) having bathed, and becoming fragrant with the application of toilette powder, are making the evening variegated with their glances rendered blue through their movement of the tremulous blue (eye) lotuses.
- (317) Also—
- (318) The expanse of the sky has become covered with darkness as if with the aromatic vapours arising from the hair tufts (of ladies) from all regions. The lights are vomiting darkness drunk in, as it were, every moment in the shape of smoke. On the Royal road are heard the girdles of the beauties noisy with jingling sound.—(beauties) setting (themselves) out alone at night for the residence of their beloveds.

(319) Shall our master come at night? Yes true.

(320) With frame disguised in and out,
With a circle of neighbouring kings,
With mind bent upon the aim,
Deceived have I Chāṇḍasena.
But when the enemy is base,
Is deceit to be blamed?
Indra hurled his thunder bolt,
When the demons went astray,
So shall master show his valour.³⁹

(321) (Then Virasena enters accoutred with arms and with a sword).

(322) Vira—After a long time have I now reached Kuśumapura. (sighing).

(323) Owing to the transitoriness of remembrances the impressions of which are decadent with the lapse of time, the activities of childhood flash on me just as previous existences (flash upon) one who remembers his former birth.

(324) (Moving round) The space (intervening the directions), is densely filled up, as it were, with layers of darkness cut, indeed, by the chisel.

(325) The road bears darkness, as grey as the dust of the battle-field (and vomited) as it were by layers of clouds. Just as the daughter of Kālinda (bears) her torrent of waters flowing obliquely from the mountain rivers.

(39) Lit.: Chāṇḍasena has been entirely deceived by me, having become disguised inside and outside and having formed a circle of neighbouring kings and with mind bent upon the course of action (laid down) by polity. When the enemy is possessed of baseness, deceit is not to be blamed, for Indra dealt with his thunderbolt being infatuated with jugglery, when the demons were lead astray; so our master will manifest his heroism.

- (326) However, going by the path known in childhood, I shall see the revered Mantragupta who has gone to the house of the Chariot-Maker. (Going round) Oh! this is that house of the chariot-maker. Alas! (announcing his signal by clapping the fingers) (exit).
- (327) Virasena—(Approaching) may your honour prosper.
- (328) Mantra—(With curiosity) Ah! Virasena! (holding his palm in his) may Your Honour be seated. (Points to the other half of the bed).
- (329) Vira—(Sits on the ground).
- (330) Mantra—Where is the master now?
- (331) Vira—On he way.
- (332) Mantra—Will our master come to Kuśumapura this very night?
- (333) Vira—Oh Revered Sir, in the morning.
- (334) Mantra—Is that so? What indeed is the division of the army near him?
- (335) Vira—Just one hundred fishermen strong: The door-keepers including Nandaka etc. who have not accompanied you to Kuśumapura, those, too, of the same age as well, and Kuñjaraka as the Supreme Commander at the head of this assemblage.
- (336) Mantra—Good, Kuñjaraka, good.
- (337) Firm is the friendship,
Descending from generation,
Even in defeat,
Lo! the sacrifice of Jatāyu,

For the cause of Daśaratha
The life so dear to him!⁴⁰

- (338) Then, when the princess had returned how could our master, afflicted with separation, put on his armour?
- (339) Vira—From the day on which the princess returned, from that very day was seen Hariṇāsva the special emergent messenger from you.
- (340) Mantra—Then, then?
- (341) Vira—Being subject to the impetuosity of wrath that was augmenting, because it had been borne for long and had now found a scope in the voice of separation from his beloved destroyed in a moment, and disregarding the enemy, our master verily put on the armour.
- (342) Master—It befits the prowess of a Kshatriya, for, behold—
- (343) She left the heart of the Lord of Men,
There dwells now fire of wrath,
As the royal goose quits the lotus lake.
Rendered hot by the rays of mid-day sun.⁴¹
- (344) Then has she never come within the range of remembrance of our lord?
- (345) Vira—Then, once on the way, when the disc of the sun inclined towards the western horizon (direction) and was setting and the

(40) Lit.: The friendliness of friends, which comes down from generation to generation in the course of succession is imperishable (constant) even in defeat; for indeed, for the cause of the son of Daśaratha, the life that was dear to him was sacrificed by Jatāyu.

(41) She herself left off the heart of the son of the King—the heart, the innermost recesses of which was possessed by the fire of wrath, for does not the royal goose quit the waters of the lotus lake rendered hot by the rays of the mid-day sun?

shades of the trees had been reversed and the evening breeze was blowing gently, that master, lying down on a bed of leaves, with head placed on the lap of Vaikhānasa and with lotus-like feet stretched in my lap, wept profusely remembering the princess saying as follows:

- (346) Thus did she and so said she, such were her actions and remembering me she positively attained to grief. The girl, unable to bear separation, was (thus) like a Chakravāka female bird on nights made rainy through streams of tears from the eyes.
- (347) Thus, and in this manner.
- (348) Mantra—When the princess returned through the order of the King, by what kind of message has Yogasiddhi pleased our master and set out?
- (349) Vīra—Even before this thing rested upon me, thereafter, too, so and so by such (messages). Hereafter your honour shall be the authority.
- (350) Mantra—Āryarakshita, the son of the priest, has been sent by me to Mathura saying—what revered Yogasiddhi has said that should be repeated again.
- (351) Vīra—Shall our work be accomplished easily?
- (352) Mantra—The revered one will endeavour in such a manner that the king of Mathurā will himself bestow his daughter upon our master. Then, I too, will propitiate our master whose coronation is approaching along with the festivity of meeting his beloved coming on in an unforeseen manner. Look:

- (353) The Union of Couples
Long unthought of Ends in bliss.
Ya! Indra's Sovereignty
Comes to nothing
Compared to it.⁴²
- (354) (Great hum of a crowd behind the Screen).
- (355) Both—Oh! It seems like (men) speaking.
- (356) [Again (noise) behind the Screen].
- (357) Oh! Oh! citizens residing in Pāṭaliputra.
Let your (Honours) listen:—
- (358) This Prince, the scion of the Magadha family, who is a great festivity to the eyes of his loyal subjects, has arrived, followed by hundreds of illustrious ministers (and) charming like the moon (followed) by crowds of stars.
- (359) Mantra—(Rising all of a sudden).
- (360) Triumphant is Vijaya first; triumphant are gods, Mahādeva himself; triumphant are the illustrious gods Ananta and Nārāyaṇa.
- (361) Who is here, Oh! (Enters the attendant).
- (362) Attendant—Oh Venerable one, I am that Saṅkataka.
- (363) Mantra—Gentle one, going thence quickly and beating the signal-tabor of the Shrine of Śūlapāṇi who is Siddha⁴³ proclaim thus:
“Now have we our work on behalf of the king. Hereafter a big battle may take place.

(42) Lit.: The Union of couples, for long unthought of is anxious for bliss. The Sovereignty of Indra does not come up to even the sixteenth part of (the overlordship) of that (Union).

(43) Endowed with supernatural power.

Consequently it is the time for workers who earn their livelihood through arms.

(364) Attendant—As the venerable one commands.
(Exit).

(365) (Both move about).

(366) Vira—Oh, The night has passed away.

(367) The darkness beaten off by the rays of the newly raising sun and stacked over the western ocean, looks, as it were, like a circle of smoke settled on the submarine fire.

(368) Mantra—Oh! day has dawned. Behold:

(369) He with his garland of rays
Rising from the deep as if from a bath
Plucks flowers for evening worship
From the tree of the sky
Flower smade of stars
Extending his thousand hands
To the end of directions.⁴⁴

(370) (Exeunt omnes.)

(371) (End of the Fourth Act).

(372) ACT V.

(373) (Enters Lokakshi).

(374) Loka—Luckily king Kalyanavarman has now acquired coronation of sovereignty. Luckily wretched Chanḍasena has been killed while engaged in persuing the Vatsas. Whence—

(44) Lit.: This sun, having bathed and risen up from the ocean is plucking flowers for twilight worship with innumerable extended hands (rays) from among the branches viz. the ends of the Directions exhuberent with flowers viz. the stars, of the tree viz. the sky.

(45) N. of Kausambi.

- (375) The whole world salutes Kalyāṇavarman, like the wish-giving tree, who has uprooted the royal family of Chaṇḍsena and has manifested the path for the (four) castes and stages of life.
- (376) (Taking a round) But, Oh, exquisite indeed is the beauty of the entrance to Kuśumapura, the Royal road of which is adorned with artistic columns viz. burglars honoured by paramours of prostitutes.
- (377) Here indeed, the big bull with gladdened mind in the cow-pens and noisy with the humming sound, immitate the rendezvous of the cleverest of profligates, charming with a concourse of harlots (and) where young women are boistorous.
- (378) Oh, This is Veśarakshita, the aged profligate. I find him drooping in the temple of Cupid in the prostitute's ward as if consigned to the bed of arrows of Bhisma, Son of Śantanu.
- (379) How?
He who was baulked of marital festivity in Saketa, exhausted by waiste girdles (of women) in Kāñchīpura, ousted by attendance (of ladies) in Pampā, given notice (to quit) in Vaidīśa, slipped into cow-pens in the town Kaṭāha, (and) was shaved (to shame) in Kundina, has attained to a fixed life, having indeed been a long time the touch-stone of harlots.
- (380) (Then enters Veśarakshita)
- (381) Veśa (sighing)—Oh, the wretch of Death, fie, fie upon thee that unites the unequal ones. Look—

- (382) Oh Creator, has thou not seen the mutual incompatibility in the age of the Easterners in regard to the Celibates, and in the years of the Westerners in regard to the Libertines?
- (383) Loka—(Approaching) Friend, What are you thinking with a closely intent mind?
- (384) Veśa—Oh, You, Lokakshi, a slave of gambling!
- (385) Whatever was present in secrecy to wanton women in prostitution quarters, whatever were the movements of friends in the rendezvous, whatever were the adventures in the dense darkness of the night, these pleasures of youth alone am I contemplating.
- (386) Loka—They speak of sensual objects as worthy of abandonment at the end, especially residence at prostitution quarters. Behold,
- (387) Leaving aside a donor proficient in organs and action, and conversing with a gentle smile a loving young man with prime youth endowed with a beautiful form and preponderant in behaviour—in fact a fit and pre-eminent man, a low man is sung vociferously by an unchaste woman—a man who is knotted with difficulties but possessed with Avanti Mashas of gold.
- (388) Veśa—Fie upon thee who followest the footsteps of those Brahmins, well-versed in sacred learning. This hatred for sensual objects is indeed due to your being scorched till the end (of your life). It is a mental dereliction of your honour. Behold:

- (389) In the prostitute quarters, honoured by young damsels engaged in the study of Dattaka Sūtras (some treatise relating to Kāmasūtras)—there having spent the middle age with sense organs tuned to decorum, at old age why is it not desirable to reflect (those) following the maxim viz. the memory of things done in middle age is the substitute in old age. Will not a Vita who is well-versed in all three Vedas realise this truth?
- (390) Let this talk break off. Gentle one, Thou art seen after a long time. Whence, tell me.
- (391) Loka—Owing to some reason I am returning after going to Mathura of Surasena.
- (392) Veśa—Is there any special talk about Surasena country?
- (393) Loka—Yes, there is; the Lord of the Yadus is determined to give away his daughter Kīrtimati to our master Kalyāṇavarman.
- (394) Veśa—These two royal families deserve mutual alliance. Who is now to introduce them to each other?
- (395) Loka—The Goddess Vindhyavāsini (alone).
- (396) Veśa—The Guardian Goddess of the Yadus is Ekāṇṇā. What then?
- (397) Loka—In the royal household of Kirtisena, there is a lady mendicant revered by all and named Yogasiddhi.
Once she, secretly, along with the queen approached the king with a picture, while he was thinking of son-in-law-par-excellence. In that picture both the figures of Kīrtimati and Kalyāṇavarman had been painted. (Then) When asked what it was the revered one said that this idea of (the union of) the couple portrayed in the picture should be carried out.

- (398) Veśa—how is it? How was it said by the Goddess?
- (399) Loka—Listen: When that night had indeed approached—
- (400) The Goddess Bhavani, with the beauty of her eyes like that of the lotus, with a form whitened with ashes, bearing locks of hair with ends resembling ears of corn and adorned by the digit of the moon, appeared.
- (401) Then She—
- (402) As Bhanumati Śaunaka, and Kuraṅgī Prince Avimāraka, this Kīrtimati deserves Kalyāṇavarman as her husband.
- (403) After reciting this Āryā verse and giving the picture, she vanished instantaneously.
- (404) That picture which had been held in her own hand was indeed seen in the hands of the Parivrājika after (her) awakening.
- (405) Veśa—The goddess is propitious. Divinities abound with miracles, what then?
- (406) Loka—Then, in that condition, Aryarakshita, the son of the priest of our master, went to the palace for the betrothal of the girl.
- (407) Then, thereafter, consulting the ministers, the lord of the Yadus came to the conclusion that this has been brought about by the gods.
- (408) Veśa—Oh, Good-luck is coming in a crowd to King Kalyāṇavarman uninterrupted.

(409) (Behind the Screen).

(410) Oh, Citizens residing in Kuśumapura. May your honours listen, listen to the words of Mantragupta, the chief of the ministers.— Though Kuśumapura is always in festivity, yet a great festival has been ordered. For,

(411) This lord of men wishes to see the city buoyant with glee and festivity and having ascended the top of the palace as the full moon rising up (overlooks) the surging up ocean from the summit of the highest peak of the Eastern Mountain.

(412) Loka—The ministers of Surasena having arrived along with the princess, this festival has been ordered, I fear, on the pretext of congratulations in consequence of regaining his kingdom.

(413) Veśa—Let your honour depart. (Exeunt both).

(414) Interlude

(415) (Enters lady-mendicant)

(416) Mendicant—Well oh! Like Prakriti, presided over by Purusha, I following the path of Mantragupta, have brought about the up-rise of Kalyāṇavarman.

(417) When is it that this king, of his own accord, is giving away his daughter to the Son of a king?

(418) (Reflecting).

(419) Or it might be the grace of the goddess. May she be propitious to me.

- (420) My mind is a little uneasy in as much as this is a deception upon the king's cleverest plan.
- (421) The king was not deceived by me while uniting his daughter with the son of the Lord of Magadha who is of equal merit—even when I outwitted him for the elevation of the Yadu lineage.
- (422) Child Kīrtimati is with Nipunika in the pleasure garden resembling a solitary place, now. First according to the instructions of the king the Lord of Magadha should be honoured first, thereafter, the princess along with their family priest. In the meanwhile, I too, will look up Mantragupta. (Exit)
- (423) (Enter the king and the Jester).
- (424) The King (Sighing).
- (425) I have come to the very city of Pāṭalīputra and the chiefs are bowing down repeatedly; the army resembling the ocean is stooping down, and the throne, too, has been acquired. The praiseworthy umbrella, the ensign of royalty of the rulers of the middle world, is also held over me, (still) not having obtained that daughter of the king, all this conglomeration is a show.
- (426) Jester—Oh Friend, don't be distressed; there is scope for hope. The priest of the Lord of Surasenas, with various gifts, is worshipfully approaching you with many presents.
- (427) King—Is it indeed a resort of hope that the Lord of Surasena, who was formally an intimate friend of my father, has sent his priest to honour me, now that I have regained my kingdom?

(428) (Enter Door-Keeper).

(429) Warder—May the King be victorious. The priest of the King of Surasena is at the entrance.

(430) King—Bring him here without delay.

(431) Warder—As the Master commands (Exit)

(432) (Enter priest and the Warder).

(433) Priest—(To himself) Rendering homage to the King, I shall thereafter justify anything with regard to the Princess along with (the help of) Mantragupta and Yogasiddhi.
Excellent Oh!

(434) The Creator has, as it were, obtained praise for bringing together people of like natures (in as much as) he unites with him that daughter of the king as the Rik with Saman.

(435) Warder—This way, this way, Sire.
(Both move about).

(436) Jester—It is a misfortune that (thy) mind is afflicted with separation from her Honour. Thy heart does not get tired even a bit through work.

(437) King—Very charming indeed is thy utterance. Behold:

(438) I am bearing the grief of separation from (my) beloved which is difficult to bear like a mountain.

To me indeed, the administration (of a kingdom) though of a heavy burden is, oh friend, as light as a ball in comparison with it.

(439) Priest—(Approaching) May the king prosper.

- (440) May Śambhu at last pour coronation water with streams of nectar trickling down from the digit of the moon on (his) head sprinkled with the spray (sprinkle) of the juice of the Arevata flowers ending in (the act of) removing the fatigue of the conjugal enjoyment of Gauri.
- (441) King—A seat for your Honour.
- (442) Door-Keeper—Here is a seat, May your Honour be seated.
- (443) Priest—May the King sit down.
(Both sit down).
- (444) King—Is the Lord of the Surasenas in good health?
- (445) Priest—Kirtisena, being in good health, is inquiring about the health of your Honour. There is a message of his entrusted to me.
- (446) King—What does the Lord command?
- (447) Priest—Kirtisena has said to you—Child Kalyanavarman, the Queen, the wife of King of Magadha is possessed of a good son. Let well-being in future be thine. Mayst thou live long. Luckily again, the prince has taken possession of the Sugāṅga Palace in Pushpapura.
- (447) Again, he also says:
- (448) I believe the Kaustubha gem (of Vishnu) weilder of Śārṅga, and the necklace of Kalyanavarman, are enough to decorate the two breasts of the two (individuals).
- (449) So he has sent to your Honour this necklace (Places the necklace in the hands of the Jester).

- (450) Jester—(Aside) This is the Necklace! Let your Honour behold it.
- (451) King—(Beholds the necklace with curiosity).
- (452) Priest—The king's gaze is full of curiosity; this gem of a necklace is all-in-all to the Royal Family of this Surasena dynasty. But is there any curiosity to hear of the advent of this necklace?
- (453) King—We are full of curiosity.
- (454) Priest—Then the king deserves to listen. At that time when the battle of Mahābhārata was going on—
- (455) This necklace composed of the fruit-like pearls issuing out of the temples of that elephant Supratika, who was laid low by the arrows of Gāndivī (Arjuna), an expert in executing a complete cleavage of the circular array of troops darting arrows to the right and left, vies in beauty the conglomeration of stars and scorns the bits (spray) of horse-laughter of Śiva.
- (456) King—Oh, indeed, this is a wonderful necklace of gems, to be longed for by brave men.
- (457) Priest—Then—
It (the necklace) occupied the space intervening the arms of Bibhatsu (Arjuna) having come into friction with the course of the arrows on (Śiva) in the garb of Kirāta, (arrows) which were marked as it were with fresh wounds, red with the redlet of the sloping breasts of Vrishni damsels.
- (458) King—So there was disposal (of it) according to its origin.

(459) Priest—

Thereafter when Dwāravati was begirt with ocean and Vrishnis were in that plight, then the ornament, viz. the necklace was given by Dhananjaya while installing a Vrishni Prince called Pancha in the Surasena country, through the order of the royal sage Yudhishtira who was desirous of retiring from the world and with which Parikshit had been installed. It came down to Kīrtisena, the lineal successor. Luck to thee and thine.

(460) King—(Looks at the necklace with tears in his eyes.)

(461) Priest—Why is the Lord shedding tears at the sight of the necklace?

(462) Jester—Who does not shed tears on the glorification of the descendants of Ajmidhās? How much more on seeing the wonderful ornament worn by them?

(463) Priest—What is right and proper has been uttered.

(464) King—Preceptor, rest thyself. Nandaka, let Mantragupta be addressed with my instructions. I should like to see the venerable one rested and happy.

(465) Nandaka—As His Majesty Commands.

(466) Priest—As the Lord wishes. (Exeunt with Nandaka).

(467) Jester—Why are you infatuated now?

(468) King—(Placing the necklace on his breast). Friend, on seeing the necklace my love has revived profusely. Behold:

- (469) That old time, though it has expired, has indeed come back, ever since that Princess of Yadu lineage came in contact with me like illusion.
- (470) Where, indeed, shall I enliven (my) Self which is (so) perturbed?
- (471) Jester—Shall we go to the Dining Room or to the Kitchen?
- (472) King—Give up jocoseness.
- (473) The young elephant, viz. Love, after entering the well of the navel and reaching to the top of the breasts by the line of the abdomen hair, having regained vigour by the (waving) of lights (Nirajana) in the guise of the gems, viz. the throbbing lips, and caught hold of by the sportive side-glances, is irresistible and has received favour of the queen by mounting upon the drum-like girdle with jingling gems.
- (474) Again,
- (475) In my mind which is ignited by the flames caused by the separation of my beloved, Manmatha seems to be practising to inflame himself, so as to make his body fit for being burnt by Śiva, towards whom his enmity was fixed.
- (476) Jester—Let it go, Let us enter the pleasure garden.
- (477) King—Go ahead. (Both move on).
- (478) Jester—We have reached the pleasure garden, enliven thyself.
- (479) King—Friend, the malady of love, being imperceptible to the eye, is beyond all treatment. Behold:

With imagination that pervades the whole soul, that very same beloved is seen as before by the side and in front day and night.

The torment due to the separation, alas, increases in my mind, which is (bound) with associated abhorrence for lovely things. The ways of the Divine Creator are curious!

(480) Jester—Let us enter this Bower, laughing as it were, boisterously with blooming Mallika flowers, and, charming in consequence of this Summer season.

(482) King—So be it. (Both enter)

(483) King—Oh, Wretch of Death! fie, fie upon thee, who bringest union between unequals. Whence:

(484) The Night which is bad to union in consequence of separation becomes longer, and the Night familiar to the union, wears off quickly. If these two have been placed in inverse order by Thee, O Creator, (the pair of) Lovers possessed of this assurance cannot censure thee even in their distress.

(485) (Sits on the surface of a rock full of anxiety)

(486) (Enter Kirtimati and Nipunikā).

(486) Nipunika—Princess, This is the Lord, Let the Princess see him.

(487) Kirti—Oh, The Lord?

(488) Nipu—(Shows the picture).

(489) Kirti—(Turns back with jealousy on observing it).

(490) Nipu—What is this?

- (491) Kirti—Hallow, this man is bad-charactered. Forgetting this person (i.e. myself), distressed with separation all this while, he is seen amusing himself with another (girl).
- (492) Nipu— (To herself).
On recognising the Prince in the painting in reality, in consequence of her love overreaching the memory, the Princess is possessed by the confusion of another girl caused by the perception of her own likeness.
(Aloud) You are deceived by your own likeness.
- (493) Kirti—Oh, Fie, I have done him wrong (Remains struck with shame).
- (494) Nipu—Look, look at the Prince, Oh, Princess. (Look, May the Princess look at the Prince).
- (495) Kirti—Sitting where and becoming tranquil, shall I gratify my eyes on looking at the likeness of Aryaputra?
- (496) Nipu—This, in front is the Bower, let us enter.
(Moves forward).
- (497) Jester—What is being thought over by Your Honour?
- (498) Nipu—Princess, from inside the Bower is heard a voice like that of revered Vaikhanasa. Let us look through the cluster of the Creepers.
- (499) Kirti—So be it. (They do accordingly).
- (500) Nipu—Oh! The Lord!
- (501) Kirti—(He) Indeed is not the Lord. I shall not stay near him. (Begins to turn back).

- (502) Nipu—Thou art indeed deceived by seeing the Royal costume.
- (503) Kirti—Mad one, how can he be the great king who puts to shame the moon on the full-moon night?
- (504) Nipu—The beauty of the countenance of thy Lord, with body emaciated through separation is like that of the moon at Dawn. Again, Venerable Vaikhanasa, is talking sitting by him.
- (505) Jester—Anybody croaking like a jakal cannot look nice, so give me a reply.
- (506) King—Friend Vaikhanasa,—
- (507) Kirti—Yes, the Lord indeed, Friend, go ahead.
- (508) Nipu—Princess, What kind of obstruction is sought by me? Horripilation, like bodice, is spread by thee alone on thy whole body.
- (509) Kirti—Friend, Are you putting me into shame?
- (510) King—I am thinking of the very first meeting with my beloved.
- (511) When for kissing, I up-raised (her) face scented like lotus, with eyes tremulous, and horripilation on cheeks, and with lips like coral; my eyes were covered by the hands of that enchanting slender girl, (hands) reddish in colour at the back and with embarrassment and refusal.
- (512) And moreover, just at that time indeed:—
- (513) While I was seeing a bee on a lotus entreating some mate of his and suddenly evading and kissing her lustfully, I feel sad contemplating the pet anger of my enraged beloved anger soft with affection, with tearful eyes and with flag-like arched brows.

(514) Jester Friend, I mention one administrative matter.

(515) King As it pleases you.

(516) Jester Now that you have regained your kingdom, remain merely eating and drinking. What is the good of that incident about that girl which has long since passed away?

(517) King Pie on thee, idiot.

(518) Nipu Begone, thou wicked chap, when thou art a king, is this thy administrative work?

(519) Kirti (smiles).

(520) King -Ah, Beloved, -

(521) (My) Heart is with thee alone, consequently this eye-sight of mine is not lucky but is completely distressed, oh slender one When one's own companion has shaken away (from him) violently, whence is delight to a man though his object has been attained a hundred-fold?

(522) Nipu--Princess, The Lord is muttering very pathetically.

(523) Kirti--There is no opportunity for me to reply.

(524) Nipu--I just throw up this picture scroll in front of the Lord. (Does so).

- (525) Jester---Alas! Alas! a huge serpent! a huge serpent which is inapproachable on account of its rounded hood and fierce-looking tail.
- (526) King---Oh! (Observing carefully) This is that Picture scroll. Friend, take it up.
- (527) Jester --Ha, Ha! This indeed is not a big cobra, but a picture-scroll. I take it up.
- (528) King- How has this picture descended here? Let us get out of this Bower and find it.
- (529) (Both act as if coming out).
- (530) Nipu---May the Lord be victorious.
- (531) Kirti-- May Aryaputra be victorious.
- (532) (Both salute) (The king lifting up Kirtimati embraces her).
- (533) King--- What special luck to us both! Or, Oh, friend Vaikhanasa,--
- (534) I, being overwhelmed with sadness, don't trust, Oh Friend, though I perceive. Many a time have we been deceived by the goddess with wishing as her vision.
- (535) Jester This horripulation spread all over your body should be asked if this is true or not.
- (536) Nipu---Lukily the Princess is beholding the Lord who has obtained the title of the King.
- (537) King---(With joy) Oh Nipunika, frequently there is mockery of Royalty, and enjoyment for the rulers of the earth.
- (538) But, we are blooming up with pride, because, Kirtimati alone is my Goddess of Fortune.

- (539) (Aside) Friend Vaikhanasa, What is this which is up to now unknown to us.
- (540) Jester—This Mantragupta knows.
- (541) King—Bravo, Mantragupta, Bravo. I am propitiated excellently. Friend Vaikhanasa,
- (542) Just as Kavi brought prosperity to Vrishaparya and as Spring strength to Surpakasasin, and Guru enlightenment to Indra, so what will not my eternal friend do (for me)?
- (543) Jester—The gathering of clouds accompanied by wind with the last part of the day darkened and with quaters burst assunder, will worry us. So let us get in.
- (544) Kirti—(Listening to the thundering of clouds)—Aryaputra, Save me (Embraces him tremulously).
- (545) King—Well, indeed, are we pleased (with this) misapprehension. Beloved, behold the advent of the Season (with) elephant like clouds.
- (546) This is the golden armpit, O maid, with thighs resembling the back of the fore-arm. Untrue indeed is the streak of lightening. His mode of elegant dressing resembles the rainbows of Indra who is getting tired. The increasing thunder is the conglomeration of sprays of the rainy season. The celestial elephant has been manifested by various signs accessible in the clouds.
- (547) Also—
- (548) Let the peacock hover about with his crest elongated with the commencement of dancing.

Let the fragrant Kakubha (Arjuna tree) manifest flowers smelt by bees.

May indeed the damsels turned back and honoured, develop the braid of Simantini women* with parting hairbraid expanding over the cheeks and temples.

(549) (Exeunt omnes.)

(550) End of Act V.

(551) End of Kaumudi-mahotsava

* Married women.
